He said that although only one arrest was made, several minor-in-possession (MIP) of alcohol citations were issued. "I'm really glad I went," Starke said.

Brandon Casteel, president of Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity and a senior international marketing major, said he was excited about the ride-along.

"I thought it was pretty funny when I first thought about it," Casteel said. "I'm really looking forward to it." Casteel joined two officers while they patrolled the Northgate area on foot.

Jordan said the ride-along program helps the relationship between fraternities and police.

"If we can build a positive relationship by doing this, then that's a great accomplishment in itself," he said.

become physicians.

"Had they had this training prior, it would have made a world of difference," he said. "Folks actually going into the health field will have some knowledge to help them interact with patients from other cultures."

This is the first time A&M has offered a course combining the studies of cultures and medicine at the undergraduate level.

Gangotena said she is looking forward to the class because it offers so much potential for success.

"I am going to have fun with the class, and I think the students will too," she said.

COURSE

Bosquez said students in the medical profession can benefit from this course because of the differences in cultures. Students should understand these differences to be sensitive to a patient's needs, he said.

Gangotena said her goal is to provide students with thought patterns to understand and interact with other cultures without changing one's own views.

Bosquez said the course gives future medical students a head start because they will be culturally aware when they
