SHACK

Todd Townsend, a senior bioenvironmental science major, said the organizations are promoting the need for housing and helping Habitat for Humanity raise funds.

"We've made about $2,000 from bids on the shacks," Townsend said. "Our goal is to raise $30,000 this year, the amount needed to start a new house."

The A&M chapter is not currently building a house, but is concentrating on fund raising until August.

They began building a house on Luther Street last fall and completed it in June with the help of volunteer support.

"We could start construction in January on a new house, but we would have a hard time getting everyone coordinated," McKeon said. "So we'll break ground in August."

Many students do not realize the families the houses are built for invest time and labor in the construction of their house and others, she said.

"Most families put in at least 200 hours of work before construction even begins, and participate all through the process," McKeon said.

The family buys the house at cost from Habitat with an interest-free mortgage.

Before construction begins, Habitat will assist the Bryan-College Station chapter, then by supplying volunteers for their projects.

Trish Burk, executive director of the Bryan-College Station for Humanity, said she provides administrative support to the campus organization.

"They are so well-organized and have such good support from the university," Burk said.

Tram said the purpose of the Shack-a-thon is to inform the community about the need for housing and to raise money for Habitat for Humanity.

"If everyone on campus donated $1, we'd have the money in no time," Tram said. "Tram said a dollar out of the entire year isn't much."

BURGLARS

Lt. Scott McCollum, public information officer for CSPD, said preventing car burglaries is simple.

"The main thing is to eliminate the opportunity for a criminal to make you the victim," McCollum said. "If I walk past 10 cars, in seven of them I will find a purse, or a radar detector, or stereo equipment. Some of these cars are even unlocked. The best prevention is having common sense. You need to hide anything of value under the seat or in the trunk."

"If criminals don't see anything in your car, chances are they'll pass to the next car," he said.

McCollum said night clubs and apartment complexes are other hot spots for car burglaries to occur. He said criminals tend to break car vent windows because they are smaller and not as noticeable to officers patrolling the area.

Car alarms are helpful, McCollum said, but will not always stop a criminal.

"An alarm is a step in the right direction," McCollum said. "But they are not a cure-all for common sense ... If he (the burglar) sees something of value that he wants, he's going to get it."

McCollum said alarms are helpful because car burglars have "a wealth of pickings," and will most likely burglarize a car without an alarm.

Wiatt and McCollum both said patrolling officers are usually the first ones to notice if a car has been burglarized.

Kevin Henrichson, a senior finance major, was almost a victim of car burglary. He said when the perpetrator broke the front passenger window of his Isuzu Trooper at his College Station duplex, the alarm went off and scared the suspect away.

Although it cost Henrichson around $150 to replace his window, his stereo equipment, radar detector and other items were left alone.

"I found the officers to be very professional," Henrichson said. "They were already patrolling the area looking for cars that had been broken into."

Henrichson said he did not expect the police to solve the crime.

"I pretty much felt helpless," he said. "And I felt like they were helpless too. [Car burglary] is a pretty big problem in this town and the police almost just accept that there's little they can do about it."

Car stereos, Henrichson said, are abundant in College Station and that draw criminals.

"There are a lot of nice stereos in this town because music is pretty important to college kids," he said. "It's (car burglary) such a big business in this town, that businesses actually come to your car to replace a window. It's pathetic."

CELEBRATION

"[It is] a celebration of the past, of what our forefathers have laid for us and the future," Rhodes said.

The cultural celebration does not replace Christmas, though gifts are sometimes given.

When gifts are given, suggested they be hand-made or functional, such as a book. This is to lessen the stress of the financial strain of the holidays.

Dessiree Ewing, BAC president and sophomore biomedical science major, has coordinated efforts to involve the community and educate children about Kwanaa. The BAC has organized children to participate in an art contest. Artwork should reflect one of the principles.

"I feel like it will be a success," Ewing said. "The interest level is high on campus."

Vendors will sell items at the Pre-Kwanaa festival, and African-American student associations are preparing various ethnic appetizers.

"I'm looking forward to it. For me it's a reclaiming of roots and heritage," Ewing said. "I get a better understanding of the community that came from."
