Aggies prepare for game

"I've never really cared very much about the Super Bowl, but it is a good excuse to get together."

England Patriots prepare to face off Sunday in New Orleans at Super Bowl XXXI.

To some students, the Super Bowl represents the most important game in the sports year.

Andree Beaudoin, a senior elementary education major, said she is not going to miss the opportunity to go out and have fun with her friends. "It's the only game of the year I look forward to," she said. "I'm definitely going somewhere. I'm not going to just sit here and watch it by myself. You have to share the Super Bowl with other people. That's the best part of Super Bowl."

The drink specials, prize giveaways and 'freebies' offered by some Bryan-College Station businesses are reason enough for many students to watch the game in a restaurant or bar.

Amanda Barnett, a bartender at The Fox and the Hound, said she expects a large crowd on game day because sports fans often gather there.

"We have a big crowd when the Rockets games are on," she said. "So we should be packed for the Super Bowl."

While hundreds of students will crowd the restaurants and bars Sunday night, many others will choose to throw their own Super Bowl parties. A house party is just as much a part of game day as the game itself for some students.

Chris Flores, a junior journalism major, made a Super Bowl Sunday party a tradition at his apartment.

"Watching the game is fun, but who is coming to my party is just as important as who is playing the game," he said.

For others, however, the game does not hold much interest.

L.T. Jordan Institute inducts members

By JOANNE WHITTEMORE
THE BATTALION

The L.T. Jordan Institute for International Awareness held its tenth annual installation Wednesday evening in honor of ten new L.T. Jordan Fellows.

The Jordan Fellows are Texas A&M students who travel abroad to gain international exposure. The students receive funding for their trips through travel grants provided by the Jordan Institute.

Jonathan Handelman, a new Jordan Fellow and an English graduate student, said he will travel to the Oaxaca region of Mexico. He said it is a good opportunity to visit Mexico for more than just recreation.

"We (Handelman and his wife) thought we should take advantage of being so close to Mexico," he said. "It forces us to go and do real research, rather than just as tourists."

Handelman will be conducting studies in "magical realism," which takes normal daily life and incorporates "strange" occurrences as if they were ordinary.

He said he chose Mexico because of the Latin American influence present in numerous "magical realism" stories.

"North America doesn't have a lot of magical realism," Handelman said. "Latin America has tons of it. What makes them different?"

Fred Pearl, director of the L.T. Jordan Fellows Program and a former Jordan Fellow, described the criteria necessary to become a Jordan Fellow.

The students must propose an independent research project designed to give them an enriching cultural experience. The students also must represent the University in a respectable manner, serving as ambassadors for the school. When the Jordan Fellows return from their projects, they are required to write a research paper and give a presentation on their findings.

Luke Altendorf, director of the L.T. Jordan Institute, presented the institute's history. The Jordan Fellows are a division of the Jordan Institute which was established by Jessie W. Jordan in honor of her late husband, Leland T. Jordan, Class of '29.

Altendorf said the Jordans were world travelers and the Jordan Institute was a fulfillment of the dreams. Altendorf said Mrs. Jordan passed away last December, but she will be remembered as a true Aggie.

"Though she never attended Texas A&M, she was one of the most dedicated Aggies I have ever met," he said.

Emily Ashworth, the Assistant Provost for International Programs, said the Jordan Institute is one of the few programs on campus that emphasizes the importance of international experiences.

"No other programs on this campus have done as much as this institution in promoting international awareness," she said.
