VOCOM

Gilbert Schorlemmer, a student worker in the financial aid office and a political science and economics major, said VOCOM should alleviate some of the frustration in the financial aid office. "The lines are avoided," Schorlemmer said. "You come here (financial aid office) and you used to have to wait in long lines."

Unlike the registration system, students can transfer to a human operator at any time during the VOCOM process.

"VOCOM is going to facilitate getting our customers where they need to be," Lawson said.

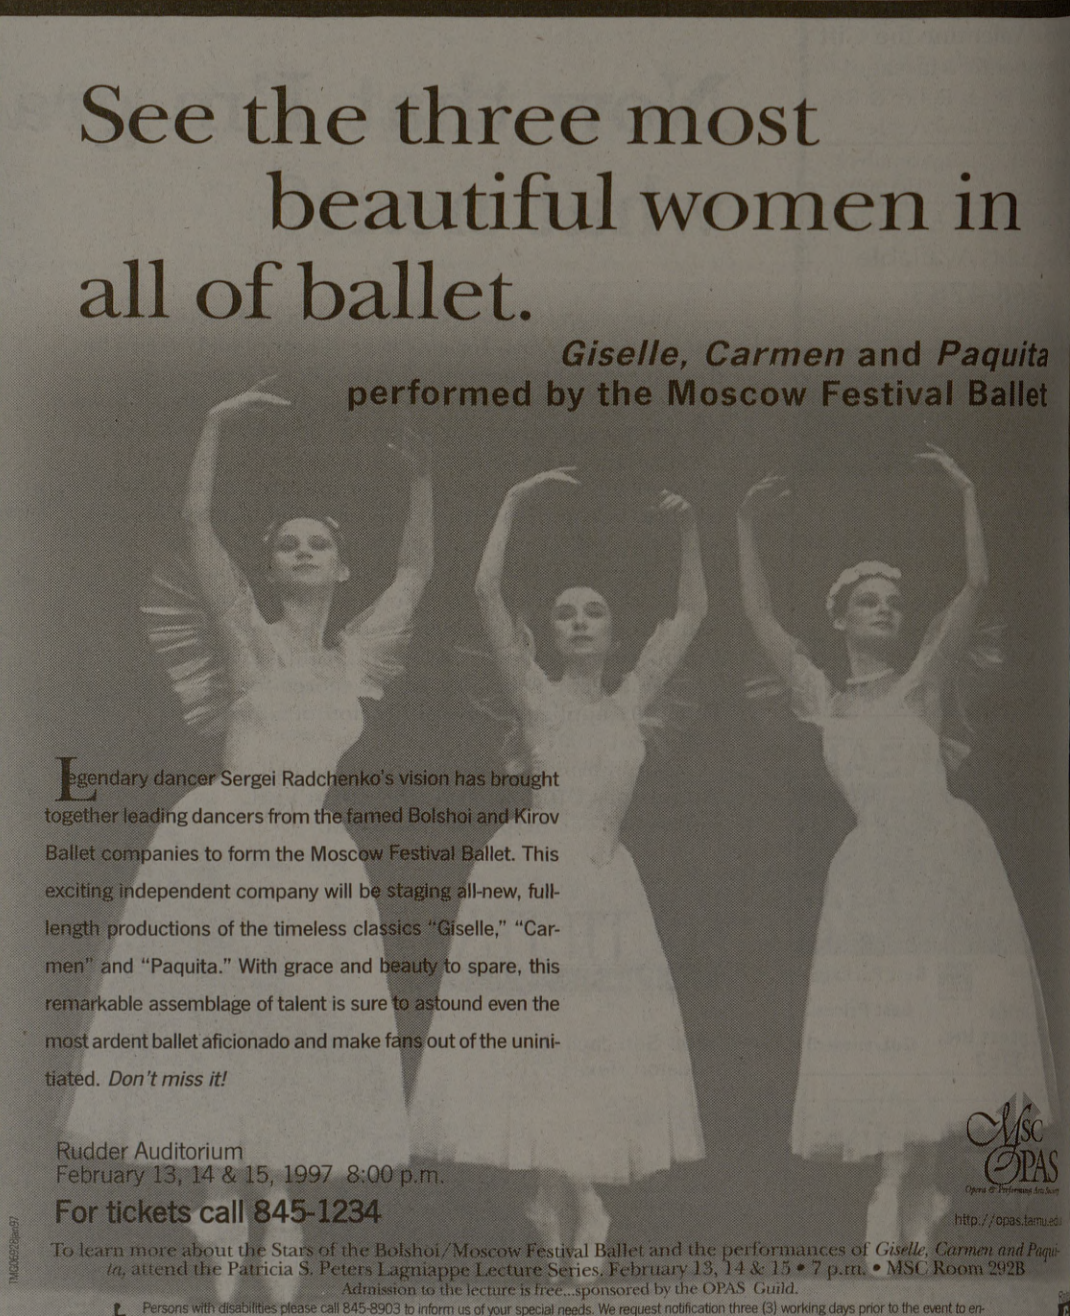

Schorlemmer said the only drawback of VOCOM is its tie to the phone registration system. During peak registration hours, VOCOM could be inaccessible to some students, he said.

Lawson said students should use VOCOM to help correct potential problems with the system. "We really need our students use it so we can find out what they like, [and] what it is that they need," Lawson said.

The financial aid department does not have a web version because of security concerns, Lawson said. He said they plan to have one by 1999.
