Surf watch: New breed of stalker uses Internet to its advantage

By MICHAEL SCHAUB
THE BATTALION

He had not seen his daughter in years, the man wrote in an e-mail message to Chris Dennett, and he was looking for her phone number at Texas A&M.

Dennett, a junior computer engineering major, said he sensed something was a little strange about the e-mail.

"I imagine he got my e-mail address through Dunn Hall's web page," Dennett said. "I wasn't about to e-mail him back. I got the girl's phone number off the computer phone book and called her."

The student told him she had been trying to avoid her estranged father for years, Dennett said.

"If he'd been smarter, he could have got that information," Dennett said. "If he'd called student locator here, it would have been fairly easy."

The case is not an unusual one to some college students. With personal information about students available online, would-be stalkers have a new way to find telephone numbers, e-mail addresses and dorm room numbers of students.

A&M's homepage is accessible to anyone who calls it, Dennett said.

From the homepage, web surfers can access phone records of A&M students and employees. The records may include such information as home telephone numbers and addresses, without the knowledge of the student.

A Computing and Information Services employee, who declined to give his name, said the phone records can be changed at a student's request.

"They can always get rid of it by logging into PH," he said.

"PH" refers to the phone records accessible from the homepage.

Not all students' addresses and phone numbers are listed on the page, and much of the information appears to be outdated.

However, the Office of Admissions and Records would not comment on what student information it supplies to those who request it.

Some students do not see the issue of privacy and safety online as a problem.

Bryan Tucker (not his real name), a computer science graduate student, said Texas A&M protects students' privacy sufficiently.

"Whether students do enough to protect their own privacy is an entirely different question," Tucker said.

But privacy and safety on the Internet is quickly becoming a concern to many Americans.

Pennsylvania resident Marlene Stumpf was murdered last month after receiving a bouquet of roses from an online admirer. Her husband is charged in the slaying.

Last year, a woman apparently solicited her own sexual torture and murder, allegedly by a man she encountered in a "chat room."

These cases are examples of what some psychologists call "the Mardi Gras syndrome," a tendency to believe that one can say anything without consequences when hidden behind a "mask."

But finding information about people anywhere in the country is not difficult at all, Dennett said. Internet searches and phone directories not only provide a web surfer with someone's home address, but some print a map showing the exact location of the residence.

There is even a "Stalker's Home Page" that provides scores of links to information services and search engines.

Nevertheless, Tucker said, the Internet is not any more dangerous than more conventional sources of research and communication.

"[It's] as safe as walking down the street," he said.
