LECTURE

"Science writing is not a good career choice if you just want the facts," she said.

Miller said science writers must be able to use humor, references to popular culture, descriptive language and stimulating leads and quotes to catch and hold readers' interest.

Miller ended by giving students and faculty a chance to present specific questions they had about the speech or its subject matter, followed by a short reception.

Miller said she hoped the presentation gave the students "an idea to how science writing worked."

DISCUSSION

Solmosy added that Hungary which is on the border of Russia very close to qualifying for membership in NATO. He said there's a compromise to avoid threatening Russia with the expansion.

"We think a situation can be achieved where Russia would also consider the enlargement of NATO as a process of developing European security rather than as a threat," Solmosy said.

Dr. Bill Brands, professor of history at A&M, shed some light on the subject by explaining why NATO expansion is significant.

Brands said the Clinton administration plays a big role in whether the U.S. should support the expansion of NATO. It will increase the responsibility for the U.S., he said.

"Before the U.S. decides to support the expansion of NATO," Brands said, "they should debate about what NATO really is today."

He said NATO's purpose has changed, from preventing World War III to providing military intervention in such places as Bosnia. Brands argues the U.S. does not need NATO support to send troops into Bosnia.

Brands gave his opinion on the threat of NATO expansion could be eliminated.

"Russia should be given a status preserving the status quo," he said.

Kaplan said the United States success in keeping peace during the process showed their determination to resolve the issue.

"We just don't want NATO under," he said.
