COUNSELORS

Campers are not the only ones who reap the benefits of camp. Counselors also acquire skills at camp useful in everyday life and in their careers.

"I've learned to be more organized and to develop planning and speaking skills," Paris said. "At camp I had to get up in front of people and project myself. That will help me speak in front of any group."

Working at camp taught Walker how to handle long hours.

"I learned to be flexible and deal with a changing schedule," she said. "I'm now able to work long hours with co-workers and stay motivated."

Lemons said there are disadvantages associated with working at camp, but they are few and far between.

"The worst part about camp is the exhaustion," he said. "We only had a one-day turnaround between sessions. We had to renew ourselves physically and emotionally for every new group of kids."

Each counselor has a favorite memory or thing he or she likes best about working at camp.

"The best part about working at camp is learning from the Paris said. "They help me perspective on what's important."

Lemons' most memorable moment at camp involved coming obstacles.

"We had a group of campers weren't in the greatest physical and they ended up hiking to the highest mountain in New said. "It was awesome to be cited and in awe of everything were up there."

Walker said she loves every about camp.

"Ninety-nine percent of the a riot," she said.
