ART

Color is an important aspect of Schiffhauer's work. Unlike many artists, he chooses a traditional route, mixing his own colors, leading to vibrant, textured works with a unique and unusual look. Schiffhauer creates pieces with dramatic composition he hopes will have a lasting impact on viewers.

"I hope the images will be strong enough to have emotional impact, not just a neat trick and nice color," Schiffhauer said. "I hope it goes deeper than that. I hope the images will remain with them beyond the Saslow said this exhibit is accessible to everyone.

"Art is something people can come to to talk about important things, just like music," she said.

One of Schiffhauer's pieces in the exhibit is called 'Mother and Child Together." The work is a leather collage created from leftover scraps from upholsterers and shoe makers. This, in Prince's opinion, is a statement that art can be anything.

Beyond the exhibits, though, Schiffhauer is an educator. Unlike many educators, Schiffhauer strives to truly make an impact on his students. Saslow said his office is always full of students. She said he really works hard to know his students outside of class and has gotten a lot of students into good graduate schools.

"He is a wonderful teacher —we are lucky to have him," Saslow said. "All students with artistic ability at A&M eventually make their way to Bob."

ust like a book can be a gift that keeps on giving, so can a pet who is not spayed or neutered. Kathryn Bice, executive director of the Brazos Animal Shelter, said there is a pet overpopulation crisis facing society right now. "Pet overpopulation really cheapens life," she said. "It makes people casual about their pets. The saddest statistic for us is that there is a large volume of suffering from pet overpopulation." Alex Schwarm, one of over 200 volunteers at the animal shelter, said the most important thing people can do to end the overpopulation crisis is to spay or neuter their pets.

The shelter is burdened with litters of puppies and kittens because people do not spay or neuter

Schwarm said. The Brazos Animal Shelter opened in 1983 and serves 10 counties surrounding the Brazos Valley. Bice said there was nowhere for animals to go

The animal shelter provides homes for str animals. Unwanted animals are evaluated adoption. Prospective pet owners are interview to assure that the lifestyles and needs of the pe ple and the animal will be compatible. Laura Hon, a senior international stud major, said she knew if she got a dog, she would get it at the shelter.

I picked out my dog, Chloe, and adopted h all in the course of an hour," Hon said. " people at the animal shelter were really helpfu and efficient. They're really careful about plat

Mary Haislet, the animal shelter's human education specialist, said many students come college and want a pet because they miss the pu pets from home. "One thing I would tell students is to listen the shelter and don't be impulsive," she sa

"Having a pet when you're a student can be dif

cult. We don't want the pet owners to be unhapped py, or the pets to be unhappy. Bice said more than 8,000 animals come in the shelter per year.

"We have over 1,000 claims of lost pets a over 2,000 adoptions a year, but over 4,000 a mals come in unadoptable," she said. "Our job to find homes for the remaining 1,000.' Bice said many people decide to dump unwa

ed animals rather than bring them to the she because people know euthanasia occurs there. "If animals are dumped in the country, they get here anyway," she said. "If people will be them here first, the animals will have a chance."

Schwarm said a lot of people have a negati stereotype of the animal shelter. "Euthanasia does occur there, but the people at shelter are trying to save the animals," he said.
