Mild uterine disorders may cause infertility

(AP) — Even mild cases of endometriosis, a common disorder of the uterine lining, can cause infertility in women, a study found.

However, the researchers also found that surgery to treat the endometriosis can nearly double such women's chances of getting pregnant.

Endometriosis — in which the uterine lining grows outside the uterus, usually in the ovaries, fallopian tubes or abdominal cavity — affects 3 percent to 10 percent of all women of childbearing age. Severe cases can be extremely painful. But mild cases often can go unnoticed.

Moderate to severe endometriosis has long been known to cause infertility, usually by blocking the fallopian tubes or ovaries with scar tissue.

The new study, published in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine, provides strong evidence that minimal or mild cases can also cause sterility in women, even when there are no blockages and ovulation is normal.

Why this is so is not clear. However, the study found that surgical removal or destruction of the growths increases a woman's chance of getting pregnant by 73 percent over the success rate of 8 1/2 months.

The study suggests that women with unexplained infertility should be examined for endometriosis in a procedure called a laparoscopy and should undergo surgery immediately if they have the condition, the researchers said.

"It's a very simple procedure," said Dr. Rodolphe Maheux, chairman of obstetrics and gynecology at Laval University in Quebec and one of the study's authors. "It can be done in 15 minutes more than the laparoscopy."

Dr. Robert Barbieri, an expert at Boston's Brigham and Women's Hospital who was not involved in the study, agreed with that recommendation.

"With these data, more doctors might say, 'You might want to try surgery first,'" instead of taking hormones to stimulate ovulation, Barbieri said.

Thirty to 40 percent of women who have unexplained infertility have minimal or mild endometriosis, he said.

DuPont warns states about generic drugs

WASHINGTON (AP) — Out of options in Washington, a big drug company has turned to state legislatures in a last-ditch struggle to stall a generic version of Coumadin, a blood-thinning medicine taken by 1.8 million people.

At stake: a $500 million a year market for DuPont Merck Pharmaceutical Co. The company is lobbying in at least 20 capitals from Sacramento to Albany for legislation to slow down introduction of cheaper generic than patients. "They are using scare tactics to frighten people and make them believe this is a patient safety issue and using that to protect their monopoly," said Bruce Downey, chairperson of Barr Laboratories, ready to market a generic version of Coumadin at a price 30 to 40 percent lower.

Dr. Roger Williams, a senior FDA official and former head of its Office of Generic Drugs, said DuPont Merck's lobbying campaign is "in the class of an economical challenge" rather than a scientific one. He questioned putting medical decisions in the hands of state lawmakers.

"The agency (FDA) since 1984 has been making these judgments about bioequivalence. We have tremendous expertise in doing this," Williams said. "It's not a matter of law, it's a matter of science."

States, not Washington, regulate the practice of medicine and pharmacy through licensing. DuPont Merck decided to take its battle to the states about a year ago, after New York-based Barr Laboratories sought FDA approval of its generic blood thinner. The brandname company began marshaling information and hiring lobbyists in state capitals.

Skull could help identify ape, human ancestors

NEW YORK (AP) — Researchers have found a skull from a 15-million-year-old monkey that suggests that a still-undiscovered ancestor of both monkeys and people looked different from what many scientists thought.
