Now that Jordan has agreed to another record-setting one-year contract — $33 million, a source close to the team said Thursday - only the Bulls' opponents have reason to worry.

For example, how does Pat Riley motivate his Miami Heat after publicly stating that Chicago is a championship lock as long as Jordan is wearing red and black? Riley and the rest of the league's coaches wish that Bulls owner Jerry Reinsdorf and general manager Jerry Krause would finally get on with the rebuilding process they have been threatening for months. Reinsdorf said he doesn't want Pippen, dangled as trade bait before the draft and still not assured of spending the entire 1997-98 season with the Bulls, said it will be his final year in Chicago.

Although Jordan wanted a guarantee that Pippen, his close friend and fellow All-Star, won't be traded, Krause said no such language exists in Jordan's new

"I can tell you flat-out," Krause said, "it isn't in there."

Neither Krause nor Jordan's agent, David Falk, would comment on the value of the contract, which follows Jordan's record $30.14 million deal last season.

But reports that he will receive anywhere from $36 million to $41 million "are way out of line," said a source who requested anonymity. "The number is $33 million," still the highest salary ever for an athlete in a team sport.

Falk said that although he, Reinsdorf and Jordan worked out terms of the contract in a brief meeting Tuesday in Las Vegas, 'these things are never easy.

"Michael wouldn't have accepted an agreement unless he deemed it to be fair," Falk said winning."
