nber 3, 1997

Wednesday • September 3, 1997

SERVICES

untinued from Page 6

Strong emotional support can found among groups where dents share problems with rs. Many groups meet at the including women's self-esm groups, international dission groups and Academic nymous are among the 14 kshops offered.

The SCS offers two phone lines. line, called the Helpline, is n after regular SCS office hours 24 hours on weekends. In its lyear of operation, the Helpline staffed by students who go ugh extensive training, they are ervised by the counseling staff, backed up by a psychologist can be directly patched into a e call.

mith said calls range from ional distress to who is a d dry cleaner.

ounseline, another line at SCS, ides taped information on w topics.

A complete list of topics can be ined at the SCS office. Also at the SCS are other reces such as the Learning Skills ter. The center provides services developed to enhance academic performance, such as literature, computer programs, videos and cassettes. Another portion of the SCS office is the testing center. This center offers the General Equivalency Degree to residents of Bryan-College Station, and other tests to guide students along their career paths.

The SCS is not the only service at Henderson Hall. Grade distribution and A&M Mentors occupy the halls as well.

The Grade Distribution Center allows students to research professors and the average grades they gave for the previous semester.

A&M Mentors is comprised of 400 faculty and staff volunteers who are available for students who want to talk about any sort of problems or concerns they might be having.

Dr. Betty Milburn, A&M Mentors coordinator, said mentors are available in nearly every department and serve an estimated 2,000 students.

Students can identify a mentor by the sign posted outside their offices. Students should make appointments with mentors so they may be able to devote the necessarv time.

and crusading federal prosecutors will be keeping our TV neighborhoods riving to handle spiritual needs. Domestic help comes in the form of a genie, a teen angel and an alien nanny.

shows about families, lovers and ex-lovers. Many of the parents will be dads coping on their own, the couples will be wildly mismatched and the exes obviously meant for each other of gay and lesbian characters -

30, according to one gay rights group - will give their straight buddies support and the common sense they were born without.

Through it all, a growing number

There are two men of the cloth ar-

Sitcom tradition has its day with safe and jails full.

LIFESTYLES 7 JUST KICKIN' BACK

Local martial arts classes prove there is more to self-defense than punches

By RHONDA REINHART Staff writer

t builds strength and relieves stress, pediatricians have recommended it to children with At-Ltention Deficit Disorder, and action-packed movie heroes have used it time and again. It is not a new psychoactive drug. It is the martial arts, and there is more to these forms of self-defense than punches, kicks and grunting noises.

The martial arts encompasses any of the traditional forms of self-defense, including karate, kung fu, judo, jujitsu and tae kwon do, and they can also be practiced as sports.

Steven Powell, who received a doctorate in kinesiology from Texas A&M, teaches American tae kwon do at the U.S. Black Belt Academy. He said the martial arts is a means of personal development.

'Martial arts is discipline, focus and a lot of mind and body interaction," he said. "It's a self-improvement thing based on you.'

Powell said studying the martial arts increases flexibilty, balance, coordination, and cardiovascular and muscular endurance.

Mark Curry, an instructor at Thomas Ashlev's Buffalo Shorin-Ryu Karate Academy, said most adults come to karate classes because they want to exercise and spar, and then they find out there is more to the art than the physical aspects.

"Karate is a way of life," he said. "Training is forever. You don't just get your black belt and then quit training. Karate is not something you do half [the] time. It's all [the] time.

Bob Perez, coach of A&M's judo team and secretary for the National Collegiate Judo Association, said sportsmanship, knowledge about different cultures and respect for other people are all lessons that can be learned from practicing judo.

"One concept in all of judo is mutual welfare and benefit," he said. "You're constantly learning different things. But once you learn something new, you pass it on to others. Don't keep it to yourself.

Perez said an open mind and learning the history are essential to the study of judo.

You can't be closed-minded," he said. "And if you don't learn the background of judo, you lose the traditions involved. You lose the meaning of judo. It also breaks the cycle of mutual welfare and benefit. Students of the martial arts can opt to enter competitions that are held worldwide On Sept. 27, A&M will play host to the Go Shibata Judo Tournament at the Recreation Sports

killed by a train on his way to the Rec Center. This is the third year of the tournament and the second year it will be held in Shibata's name.

knowledge are represented by belt degrees usualrepresented with different colors.

edge gained and skill," he said. "I don't think my belt degrees are as important as what I've learned

The belt separates someone who is experienced from someone who is not experienced," he said. "To achieve a black belt is great, but once you get there, you can't let it go to your head.

While each specific area of the martial arts has its own differences in style and technique, they share some features

For example, all of the martial arts forms are based on strong traditions. They also share the physical, emotional and practical advantages like health of mind and body and self-defense techniques.

Curry said studying the martial arts will benefit everybody in some way

When I leave the karate school, I am a new man," he said. "It gives me a different outlook on things. It cleanses mind, body and soul."

(Above) Advanced students practice with instructor Steven Powell. (Below) Arjun Vinze, stretches and meditates before his class

Photography by Derek Demere

iecond Chance Expectations are high for 36 new utes to charitie sitcoms on broadcast networks 'ervone can fi LOS ANGELES (AP) - He's a bigagents, patrol officers, sci-fi lawmen

e shops. any particularity, crime-busting priest who ques-" Robbins said tons authority, hangs with hip gay anes come in to fur els, gives counsel to single parents nents. We even and knows alien abductees but hasage clothing sec-n't personally spacewalked.

Just joking: "Father 'Hood" won't e Resale and won television this coming season. tatives said do-But the above elements, separately ne. For more in-grin various combinations, will be at g donations, call ne heart of many of the 1997-98 TV at 823-3424 orseries.

> Dramas represent a hefty chunk of 18 36 new series bowing on the six oadcast networks, with crime shows ading the pack. Spiritual themes so predominate — certain to be ned signs of rising millennial fever. rivate detectives, police deteces, police psychologists, FBI he SCS are ke sors and parer s or be inform ig counseling. aid from the St thus there is n le services. vides a variety ng workshop stress mana sociate direct

ns.

T MCKAY/THE BA

Center. The tournament is named for Shibata, a lapanese student and judo club member who was

In the martial arts, a person's experience and

However, Powell said belt degrees are not the most important part of learning martial arts.

or what I can teach other people.' Perez agrees that belt degrees are not the most

"Belts are just a visual representation of knowlimportant aspect of the martial arts.

