DANCE TEAM

The dance team has been scrutinized in the past by students who feel Texas A&M should not be represented by cheerleaders at athletic events.

Katie Floyd, a senior business analysis major, said she is not a big fan of the dance team. "This isn't high school," Floyd said. "We don't need cheerleaders or a high school drill team.

What's next, our basketball team running through a big paper sign that they painted?"

Hart said the dance team is not a group of cheerleaders.

"Some members of the student body think that we are trying to be cheerleaders, which they feel goes against tradition," Hart said. "We don't cheer during the games. We perform to support the team and provide entertainment for the crowd."

Matzke said the dance team works in conjunction with the traditions at A&M games.

"We always follow the Yell Leaders," Matzke said. "Then we get out there to get the crowd enthused."

Matzke said she is proud of the way the dance team handles the negative comments.

"We talk about it, and then we drop it," Matzke said. "The team is very mature about those kinds of situations, and we don't let it keep us from doing our part."

Tyler tells

NEW YORK (AP) — Aerosmith has been one of rock 'n' roll's hardest working bands for a quarter century, but that doesn't mean Steven Tyler has always been happy with his group's effort in the years.

Tyler

"I knew what this band is capable of, but on stage I couldn't get them to go there," Tyler said in an interview with the Daily News. "I'd be kicking a horse, waiting for it to gallop and pulled up short."

Tyler discusses the band's new book "Walk This Way," coauthored by Stephen Davis. Tyler makes it clear Aerosmith has done its share of touring over the years, something his bandmates don't dispute.

"We've always argued a lot," Tyler said. "What's important is that we make great music together, and we respect each other's musical opinions."
