Legendary Boston Garden on the verge of destruction

BOSTON (AP) — Boston Garden is officially in the hands of the wreckers.

Two years after the old arena was closed to the public, its maintenance crew turned off the lights and locked up one last time before the yearlong demolition begins.

"That's it," said Rudolph "Spider" Edwards, as he snapped a padlock on the doors leading to the floor where he had watched Bill Russell and Bobby Orr play.

Edwards spent 33 years on the Garden crew before moving to the adjacent FleetCenter, along with the Bruins and Celtics on Sept. 29, 1995.

Longtime electrician Bobby Hall clicked off the main lights, bank by bank, until only a pale glow shone over the peeling yellow paint, stacks of chairs and empty trash cans.

Cables that had hung limply in the center of the arena. The FleetCenter management is looking to give charities what's left.

By day's end, workers were to begin sealing off the building for removal of asbestos and other materials. The building itself is scheduled to be ripped apart section by section in January. Nine months later, it should be reduced to a vacant lot.

A high-rise hotel, residential, office and retail complex is expected to rise in its place. The Garden was dedicated Nov. 14, 1928. President Coolidge switched on the lights from the White House. A boxing match opened the arena a few days later.

The Bruins and Celtics were the main tenants, winning enough championships over the years to give the Garden mythical status. Elvis Presley played there. So did the Beatles, and almost every other top pop act of the 1960s, '70s and '80s. Circuses and ice shows were regular visitors.

UT is currently tied with Baylor for second in the Big 12 and is coming off two solid victories over Oklahoma and Oklahoma State, outscoring them 17-0.

Player of the week (POW)
Freshman Alison Peters doubled her season
