OLD MOVIES

Marketing films to young people has changed American cinema, Hoagwood said.

"Hollywood made movies for grown-ups," he said. "Adults were expected to go to the theaters, and they did. Now, even with the preponderance of R-rated films" movies are made for the middle-school crowd."

For those who do not consider an "old movie" to be one playing at the discount theater, classic films are available for rental at local video stores, and students can occasionally catch them at Rudder Theatre.

Brent Troyan, chair of the MSC Film Society, said the group tries to bring classic movies to the campus as part of its Aggie Cinema program.

"We want to give students the opportunity to see something on the big screen they couldn't have seen before," Troyan said. "We look for the movies everybody's heard about, but nobody's seen, like Casablanca and Breakfast at Tiffany's."

Hundreds of students attended the Film Society's showing of Breakfast at Tiffany's last Friday, Troyan said.

"With old movies, you get insight into contemporary movies," Troyan said. "It gives you a chance to see movie clichés from before they were clichés."

Hoagwood said he agrees. "You can see this kind of change come over American film," Hoagwood said. "Some people like to think what these changes in American movies reflect in American life."
