McCarthy settles down, cleans up new sitcom

LOS ANGELES (AP) — It is definitely Jenny McCarthy on NBC's new sitcom "Jenny." The blond hair, blue eyes, etc., etc. Take a closer look.

That tongue is firmly back in her mouth after wagging at countless contestants on the MTV dating game "Singed Out," which McCarthy co-hosted for nearly four seasons.

Also missing are the burping and wheezing that adorned "The Jenny McCarthy Show," her MTV sketch comedy series last spring.

Ditto for the armpit sniffing, nose picking and breaking of wind. All gone, she says. End of story. Sayonara. Ciao. Introducing a gentler Jenny.

The 24-year-old former Playboy Playmate of the Year has toned down her act to carve a new niche for herself in the parlors of America.

She says viewers can see "the other 70 percent of me" in "Jenny," airing at 8:30 p.m. EDT Sundays. And with a rating of 1.0, how bad could that be?

"It's the normal side, the human side, the girl that actually does get embarrassed sometimes and who likes talking to Mom every day on the phone," McCarthy said. "That's the whole side that's real, that piece I haven't let people see yet because I was too busy creating another image."

The weeks surrounding her network premiere were full of anxiety and joy.

"The past couple of weeks I haven't been the easiest person to live with," McCarthy said. "I've been so terrified. ... You don't know what will happen, especially when you read different reviews and you know what our work hasn't been in the past."

Weaver makes her own rules with upcoming film

NEW YORK (AP) — Sigourney Weaver is a vision as she opens the door of her hotel room — a long, sleek mink of a woman clad in a sheer, blood-red corset shirt with a fitted black skirt.

One other thing: She is barefoot.

It is a telling detail. While Sigourney Weaver may be every inch the urbane New York sophisticate — an actress with both a pedigree and an Ivy League degree — she is also a woman who deals with the world on her terms. Those heels too tight? To hell with them.

And with no less than three films coming out this fall that are remarkable for their diversity, Weaver has earned the right to kick off her shoes — figuratively as well as literally.

She stars in a dark version of Snow White: A Tale of Terror on Showtime; she is reprising her role of Ripley in Alien: Resurrection, and, most recently, she is in Ang Lee's acclaimed The Ice Storm as Janey Carver, a disillusioned suburban Connecticut housewife.

To her, it is an actor's dream to be in three such diverse films "that each demanded something different from me," says Weaver, 48. "That in itself is cool."
