4 PARAMEDICS

Part of being an emergency care team member is dealing with body fluids and solids, but the paramedics keep it all in good humor.

"My first night as a medic-1 we got a drunk call," Metzger said. "This guy had a computer paper box in front of him just filled to the brim, and the vomit had begun to eat away the sides of the box."

"This guy was 250 pounds and couldn't walk, just completely worthless, and we had to carry him out. When I got to the hospital, I just stank. It gets so that you know what you've got to do and what procedures you have to perform, and you don't notice the mess until the patient is in the hospital."

Usually the care team handles three to five calls a night, but with emergency care the only rule is to expect the unexpected.

"There is no usual night," DeCamp said. "There are times I go down to where I volunteer in Houston, some of the busiest 911 areas, and not get a single call. But then there's times I'm down here and get seven calls in a night."

"You have to be ready to do all you were trained to do because you never know what's going to happen."

The rewards of the job far outweigh the disadvantages in the minds of the emergency care team.

"The best thing about being an in-charge paramedic is going out and taking care of somebody who a lot of times is in a very serious situation," DeCamp said. "You know you're in charge of that situation and you helped them out of it."

Life on a paramedic team is one of long hours spent waiting on a call.

Their motto and purpose is to save lives, and life for them is a series of long periods of camaraderie punctuated by brief moments of saving lives and getting the job done.

WANTED

Something goes terribly wrong and the first lady is killed instead of the industrialist.

Before you can say Hillary, every law enforcement agency on Earth is after Dunn as he becomes the scapegoat for the real assassins.

Dunn has to gather the evidence to prove his innocence, while the bad guys, good guys and a public, eager to collect a $10 million bounty on his head, chase after him.

Dunn might have some allies in Dr. Victoria Constantini (Jill Hennessy), CIA Deputy Director Ken Rackmill (Paul Sorvino) and CIA Assistant Director Spencer (Eric Roberts), but he cannot be sure.

Most Wanted is not sure of what it wants to be. It borrows pieces from every conspiracy thriller released over the last year.

The plot starts with the first lady being killed, this might be a Republican kind of film, and ends up with germ warfare, corrupt governments and evil billionaires.

When the film tries to tie all these strings together, it ends up making about as much sense as letting Michael Jackson chaperone a Cub Scout camping trip.

It would have been better off not trying to cover all the conspiratorial bases.

Wayans, who is usually a funny person, plays Dunn so straight-faced he is hardly recognizable.

The only times worth watching Dunn is when some of the trademark Wayans wit shows itself, which is rarely.

It is as if Wayans learned action film acting from Steven Seagal when the pair made The Glimmer Man.

Someone needs to tell Wayans

the reason Seagal wears a permanent scowl on his face is he has no other expression. Jon Voight is the epitome of southern fried evil as Cal. His character draws out every word in such a manner if he learned to speak phonetically from an episode of Dukes of Hazzard.

Voight is so adept at hammy villains one might wonder if he isn't the love child of Miss Piggy and Satan.

He has the ability to part the best and most interesting in the movie.

Hennessy from "Lawder" is wasted in a role that can be best described as window dressing.

It is a hell of a window look at as she does her part of the platonic female lead. The same can be said for Sorvino and Roberts in their roles.

Both are fine actors, but their characters do not have depth.

The action for the movie is uncreative.

A six-year-old with a lot of action figures could score better scenes.

There is one scene in which Wayans is chased by a crowd of people, which in turn causes a huge traffic accident.

The scene is well-produced with just a hint of satire.

The movie could have a lot more of this kind of action.

There is much the movie could have used to raise it from mediocre to good.

It isn't awful, but it isn't either.

It is too reminiscent of a kind of straight-to-cable movie one might catch on HBO, only with better

TAVERN

The food ranges from classic fare, such as filet mignon, to the exotic, like the Wild Game Sampler which includes wild boar, venison and pheasant. Sandwiches, burgers and salads are offered all with unique flare.

White said all the meat used is of the highest standard, which the customers appreciate.

"All our meat from beef to poultry is free range," White said. "It results in meat being healthier and better tasting."

Despite the high demand for beef and poultry among the patrons of The Tavern, White said a seafood dish, the Snapper Ponchetrain, is currently the most popular plate at the restaurant.

Kathy Schoonover, a customer of The Tavern, has visited the restaurant five times since it has opened and appreciates the time and effort the owners have put in to it.

"It is a very nice place to come after work and unwind," Schoonover said. "The food and ambiance are excellent."

Royce Vaughn has been to The Tavern twice and said it was a unique and convenient place for him to dine.

"It is great to have a place like this in College Station," Vaughn said. "There are nice places on Oxford Street, but they are not as close to my offices and homes."

The Tavern is providing a kind of professional atmosphere in many business people are looking for.

Matt Seymour, a local business owner, has used the restaurant to entertain clients.

"It is an excellent place for clients, it's very clean and professional," Seymour said. "This town needed something like this a long time."

White said the eatery has a number of needs to meet, whether they be the older professionals or younger colleges.

"Above all else, it is a place where people can relax and enjoy good food, whether it is for a professional lunch or a romantic dinner," White said.

Kamdalam said his goal was to create a niche in the local restaurant scene.

"Most of the places tend to be a bit rowdier, here it is a slower pace," he said. "I wanted what I wanted."
