Rodriguez was born in Culican, Mexico, and relocated to East Los Angeles as a young boy. He grew up in Compton and attended Dominguez High School. He received his associate arts degree from Long Beach City College and moved on to California State University with the intent to become an attorney.

Rodriguez worked behind the scenes in a school production where his jokes prompted his acting teacher to take him to a comedy club for "Amateur Night." The club's owner offered Rodriguez a job working the door and the opportunity for nightly stints on stage. From there, Rodriguez began

"Often, students would go to the counseling center with special religious-oriented questions," Yates said. "The Student Counseling Center felt that it would be better to have members of the clergy available to answer those kinds of questions."

Yates said the people in the program listen to students with religious concerns or problems.

"We determine if we can be of help, and if we can't, we refer the student to the proper source," he said. "We are not there to convert people, but to serve the community where it is. We abide by a code of ethics that says we do not use any underhanded or coercive methods of counseling. We want to be of service to those with a spiritual struggle or any other problems."
