FEATHER

After his high-school graduation, Feather spent a year in Barcelona, Spain, as a Rotary Club exchange student. He decided to attend A&M during his time in Barcelona.

"I didn't put any thought into where I was going to school," Feather said. "In Spain, I decided to come to A&M on a whim and I told my mom to check that I was interested in the Corps."

Feather said his choice to join the Corps came a few weeks before his freshman year began. He said that although he was a reluctant cadet at first, he enjoyed the Corps.

"I was disappointed in my academic program my first semester, but I really liked the Corps," Feather said. "I didn't like the big classes and it was a big adjustment from the lax lifestyle in Spain and small town life."

In the Corps, Feather has been in Squadron 8 and was the leadership training sergeant on last year's Corps staff. He also is a Ross Volunteer. He was nominated for the commander position by last year's Corps commander, Steven Foster.

"The greatest feeling I have ever experienced is leading the Corps with the (Aggie) Band right behind me in march-ins and Corps trip parades," Feather said. "It is such a rewarding experience and it sends chills down my spine."

The commander said he is grateful for his experiences at A&M, although he wishes he had been more involved in other campus organizations. Feather said he loves A&M and the Corps, but A&M lacks ethnic and ideological diversity.

Feather said the Corps has seen improvements, but he does not take credit for changes.

"The Corps has improved, not because of what I did, but what guys a few years did," he said.

Corps commanders have vision, a willingness to make unpopular decisions, the ability to handle people, maintain a balance between the Corps and the Trigon business, Feather said.

Ken Evans, deputy commander and a sergeant major, said he possesses these characteristics.

"Danny is very loyal to the Corps and Texas A&M," Evans said. "He stands up for cadets, makes hard and unpopular decisions and carries them out ethically, reliably and responsibly."

Feather is working to dispel misconceptions about the Corps on campus. Negative stereotypes about the military, particularly women in the military, were addressed by the Corps.

Feather said he looks forward to a bright future for the Corps in a few years because of the changes in the way we view the military, he said. "I also see potential for cadets' academics."

"Danny is very loyal to the Corps and A&M."

ing. We will have a Corps with an increased leadership."

Feather will graduate in 1998. Evans said Feather has excellent academic records, speaks two foreign languages and has studied abroad.

After graduation, Feather will take a National Guard commission in the Army. After that, he wants to work in management consulting, investment banking or the oil and gas industry.
