FURTICK

Obviously Ruth had a prosperous and successful career, but if The Bambino was roaming right field at Yankee Stadium today, instead of in 1930, there wouldn't be a record left intact by the end of his career.

Ruth played in an era of baseball before there was a divisional structure. The American and National Leagues simply sent their respective champions to the World Series. So in Ruth's day, it was not unlikely for a team to have a 15-game lead at the All-Star Break, as was the case for the Yankees many times during the Babe's career.

New York won seven pennants in Ruth's tenure by an average of 8.5 games per season. There wasn't a lot of pressure on him to carry the team in the second half of these seasons. The Yankees could jump out to a big early lead in the standings and just cruise until October.

But in those years when New York found itself in a pennant race late in the season, Ruth was unstoppable.

In 15 seasons with the Bronx Bombers, Ruth played in a legitimate pennant race eight times. In those years he hit .360 with a .749 slugging percentage and .494 onbase percentage while averaging 49 home runs, 142 RBI and 147 runs scored. All of these numbers eclipse Ruth's career averages and give validity to the theory that he would sparkle in today's league structure. With eight teams going to the postseason instead of two as in Ruth's day, almost every team has some shot at making the playoffs. The Babe would be involved in more pressure situations like the ones he dominated 60 yeas ago.

Another piece of Ruth lore that is often overlooked when comparing baseball's greats is that he pitched almost exclusively for the first six years of his career while playing for the Boston Red Sox. Add 3,000 at bats to Ruth's statistics, and he would have undoubtedly put his records well out of the reach of any challengers, ever.

Interestingly enough, the Babe could pitch.

While with Boston, he went 89-46 with a 2.04 ERA. Twice he won 20 games in a season, as well as pitching two 300-inning seasons. He also threw 105 complete games and 17 shutouts. Ruth threw 316 innings. 12, while leading the Ame League with a 1.75 ERA allowing opponents to his
