HARDWARE DESIGN OPPORTUNITIES

The Hardware Engineering Group at Inter-Tel is responsible for designing and testing Inter-Tel's line of communication systems. The hardware design group offers the opportunity to learn and use a wide variety of disciplines including digital, DSP, UP, and analog design skills. Inter-Tel's Hardware Engineering Group will provide you with a chance to be creative, learn new skills and develop state-of-the-art circuits for our advanced communications systems.

Inter-Tel Firmware Opportunities

Inter-Tel is also looking for software engineers for its System Software group. The group focuses on embedded Operating Systems and the design and development of real-time software. Platforms range from 8-bit microcontrollers like the Intel 8051 through Motorola's 680x0 family and into the realm of DSPs. Software languages range from assembly to C++, depending on the application. You'll be asked to write things like interrupt service routines, hardware-specific interface modules, and memory management functions. General DSP-based telephony applications ranging from simple conferencing, through DTMF receivers, to complex voice encoding and compression also fall under the scope of the system software group. The ability to read hardware schematics will help as part of your responsibilities will include working with our hardware department all the way from the design phase through production, with most of the time spent on systems design issues dealing with performance and real-time requirements.

Inter-Tel Software Opportunities

Inter-Tel's Software Design Group offers many exciting opportunities to develop products that are at the forefront of the telephony communications market. For 26 years Inter-Tel has set the standard in full featured, productivity enhancing, business communications tools and is today looked to as an industry leader in the PC based PBX market. This technology creates a need for skilled software engineers who excel in C++, Visual C++, Visual Basic and Windows programming. Qualified individuals will enjoy a fast paced career working on a variety of applications such as CTI (Computer Telephony Integration), voice processing and Voice over IP.

Dr. Gary Briers, professor and assistant head of the Department of Agricultural Education, said the convention is a leadership training opportunity that has produced many leaders at A&M.

"Eleven of the past student body presidents have come out of the College of Agriculture and Life Sciences and most of those have strong background in the FFA, including the present president, Curtis Childers," Briers said.

Briers said Texas A&M has a booth at the national convention career show.

"The convention gives students interaction with folks over the nation involved in agribusiness and ag industry around the world," he said. "It's a real networking opportunity with peers and potential employers."
