School shooting investigation continues

JONESBORO, Ark. (AP) — At 100 yards, their seven handguns wouldn't be terribly effective. Too hard to hit their moving targets.

But the two boys at the center of the Jonesboro schoolyard massacre, no strangers to firearms, had other options at hand, officials say.

Evidence indicates most of the bullets that felled 15 classmates and teachers, killing five of them, were fired from two powerful rifles, stolen from the younger boy's grandfather the morning of the attack.

Fifteen shots came from a replica of the M-1 carbine, a famous weapon carried by U.S. troops in World War II, Korea and Vietnam.

Five more were fired from a Remington .30-06 hunting rifle, able to take down a 200-pound deer with a single shot from a quarter mile away.

Both are semiautomatic; the only limit on firing speed is how fast a shooter can pull the trigger, which ejects the spent shell and chambers a new one in an instant.

Crime lab specialists poring over the guns expect to determine which weapons killed

The weapons police say Mitchell Johnson and Andrew Golden had following the school shooting in Jonesboro, Ark., included hunting rifles and hundreds of rounds of ammunition. A look at some of

Yet by one measure, the guns have already been examined — and found innocent.

With their considerable firepower and the carbine's battlefield origins, such firearms were considered — but rejected — for the 1994 federal ban on assault

"Much of the body work and repair is done in-house to save money," Jackson said. "This type of ingenuity is one reason our buses are still on the road. However, this will not always be the case. We cannot continue to keep these buses together with bailing wire and chewing gum. We must replace the buses.

Bus Operations is considering several options for funding new buses. Capital replacement, putting spare funds aside annually, is one of the proposals for funding a portion of the new bus fleet. Jackson said Bus Operations has not had spare money in the budget for more than four years.

In fiscal year 1998, Bus Operations shows a difference of $950,000 between budgeted income and budgeted expenses.

"If everything goes right for the last six months, we'll still be about $30,000 in the red," Jackson said. "The deficit is made up with Student Service fees allocated to us and from revenue from parking facilities that is transferred to bus operations."

A second proposal to pay for new buses includes a possible increase in the student service fee between $35 and $55 for a semester. Bus Operations reported Fish Camp, Hullabaloo-North, Center pole and Reveille as the routes losing the most money each se-Tommy Muras, a junior business analysis
