"People need to come and see the artwork," he said. "The interaction between the artist and the viewer is important. It allows the viewers to get ideas, and another view of the world."

Erin Petersen, chair of the MSC Visual Arts Committee, said the participation this year has increased from artists to viewers and there has been a lot of positive feedback.

"This show is put on by students, for students, to showcase the artwork of students," she said. "We had about 103 pieces entered into the exhibition. We are currently displaying first through third place winners and whomever the judges felt like showcasing. This is A&M art."

Petersen said because A&M does not have a fine arts department, this allows students to get their foot in the door.

"Fine arts is unbelievably important because it is a record of what is going on,"

she said. "This is something people need to learn about. It is our goal to to increase awareness. We are a valuable outlet for students to become involved."

Petersen said A&M may not be a strong fine arts school but she was amazed and impressed by how many people turned out and the material they chose.

"We had art pieces in a huge variety of material," she said. "There was work in iron, copper, clay, and leather. If I could, I would display them all."
