"If a student is a victim and the perpetrator is on campus, then we can hold that person accountable."

Lt. Bert Kretzschmar, supervisor of crime prevention unit for the University Police Department (UPD), addressed the consequences of abusive relationships and outlets of assistance.

"When you become involved in an abusive relationship, it can ruin your college life and your entire life," Kretzschmar said. "If you need help, seek counseling. If you feel like you are a victim, then all you have to do is talk to a detective. We will pursue the case free of charge."

The most frequent calls involving abusive relationships are simple assaults, Class C misdemeanors punishable by a $500 fine. The UPD received reports of 46 simple assaults, which involve counts of slapping, pushing and inappropriate grabbing.

Kretzschmar said a good percentage of reported simple assaults stem from dating relationships.

Criminal harassment is punishable by up to 180 days in jail and a $2,000 fine. Depending on the situation, a person charged with assault may receive a fine ranging from $500 to $10,000 and a sentence of up to 10 years in jail. Sexual assault, which includes rape, is punishable by up to 20 years in jail and a $10,000 fine.

Phoebe's Home coordinates the Project Date program which is designed to educate teenagers and college students about the consequences of abuse in relationships.

Peterson said the forum, like Project Date, makes an effort to increase awareness on the campus.

"A lot of people do not see a relationship as abusive, and people may get sidetracked on violence," Peterson said. "The program teaches you how to help a person (involved in an abusive relationship) and to make sure services are available."

Phoebe's Home sheltered 272 women and 258 children during the 1997 year, according to officials.

Nonresidential and counseling services assisted 116 women, 63 children and 2 men last year, according to reports from the shelter.

Those who seek help or have questions concerning abusive relationships may contact Phoebe's Home.

IRS official says agency mistreats whistle-blowers

WASHINGTON (AP) — IRS whistle-blowers "are ostracized and their careers destroyed" while senior officials go unpunished for fraud and abuse, an agency executive testified Tuesday as the Senate opened new hearings on alleged abuse and mismanagement.

Yvonne D. Desjardins, who heads the IRS chief counsel's employee and labor relations section, described herself as a whistle-blower who also handled many reports of misconduct against senior tax agency officials between 1994 and 1996.

She cited a sexual harassment case by an unidentified senior official, which resulted in a recommendation of disciplinary action. "It remained on the deputy commissioner's desk for over two years at which time the executive retired and the case was closed," Desjardins told the committee.

Later, IRS Deputy Commissioner Michael P. Dolan issued a statement saying the agency will review discipline of senior managers under his watch as part of a broader examination of internal policing. "I welcome this review of the disciplinary determinations I have made," Dolan said.

Amid the scrutiny, the Clinton administration announced the appointment of former FBI and CIA Director William Webster to review the practices of the tax agency's criminal investigative division. IRS Commissioner Charles O. Rossotti said Webster is part of a broader review of the agency's inner workings.

Rossotti will request a meeting with Desjardins to discuss her testimony, the agency said. "Today we heard very serious allegations, which we will thoroughly review," the IRS said in a statement.

She told the Finance Committee, "The whistle-blowers are ostracized and careers destroyed and those senior officials who engaged in the misconduct which was reported and substantiated are not only protected from receiving any disciplinary actions but are oftentimes rewarded during the same year the misconduct occurred."

She also made allegations of abuse of IRS travel policy, such as unauthorized hotel stays or personal use of frequent flier tickets generated on government trips.

This week, Democrats released an internal Treasury report that found no evidence to back up most of her testimony, particularly that low-income taxpayers were being singled out for audits and IRS management was "fabricating evidence" against taxpayers. But the report sided with Long in saying IRS management appeared to treat managers differently from employees in disciplinary cases.

The new round of hearings drew criticism from Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., who said that while the IRS needed improvement the sessions lacked balance and "failed to rise above partisan politics."

"Passing a solid restructuring bill will do more to get the IRS on track than a hundred of these hearings where we sit, pontificate and play politics," Baucus said.
