HINZE

"The problem with cross country is that it doesn't have its own scholarships to give out. They were given out by the track program and I had very little control over the final decisions. Now that I'm in charge of the entire program, I can have more of a say in where the scholarships will go. All decisions will rest with me," Hinze said.

Although Hinze sees the new post as a great career move, he has not ruled out the possibility of returning to A&M as a coach one day.

"I have all the respect in the world for Ted (Nelson), but I would love to be the head coach for Aggie track and field someday," he said. "I've moved on now, but I would really love the opportunity to coach at A&M again."

Stress reliever

Dr. Nancy Wang administers acupuncture to Dr. William Smith for back and arthritis problems. Wang operates a local clinic specializing in the ancient Chinese practice of using needles on the human body to relieve pain.

BOOKSTORES

"When a student is trying to sell back a book," Koenig said, "the amount of money they get for that book depends on if a professor has ordered the same book again for the student to receive 50 percent of the price the student bought the book at."

"If we have accepted all the books that we will need for that class after buy backs, we will only buy the book back at 20 percent or less."

Both Koenig and Kelley said buy backs really depend on the demand of the book for the next semester.

"I feel for students," Kelley said. "It's a matter of professors turning in their requisition forms and the store getting that paperwork processed so we can buy back books and order more for the next semester."

"Some departments on campus are better than others at getting in the requisitions."

Cathryn Looney, Barnes and Noble assistant manager, said although the textbook store, Barnes and Noble, has seen more students come to look for required reading their classes.

"Many students come to study, but many also come to look for books for class," she said. "Currently we are trying to improve relations with students and professors by working with professors to get the students need."
