SENIORS

College life is also about growing up and making mistakes.

Caffey said some of her greatest lessons were learned the hard way.

"I remember one of my first biology tests where I went over to a friend's house the night before and had a couple of drinks," Caffey said. "I bombed the test the next day and learned that I couldn't go out the night before."

Those little mistakes and other experiences in college give students a small taste of the real world.

However, college does not always prepare students for everything after graduation.

Allison Foster, a senior psychology major graduating in May, said she found college was just the first step in preparing her for her career.

"A lot of times when you go into college, you have the expectations that, 'Oh, wow! I'm going to go to school for four years and get a job, and I'm going to know everything,'" Foster said. "But nowadays, you need a master's degree or a Ph.D. just to get a job."

After graduation, Foster said she plans on entering nursing school to continue her education.

Kevin Lyssy, Class of '97, dunks his Aggie ring on Northgate Friday night. Receiving the ring are the many senior-exclusive traditions A&M students can look forward to.

Many students find graduate school is a necessary step for the future, but Robert Choi, a senior accounting major graduating this December, said he is just glad to be graduating and is ready to enter the workforce. "I'm ready to get out of here and start working," Choi said. "I'm a little worried about finding a job, but other than that I have no worries."

Choi said he will not miss much about college because he will always have the memories.

He said the best memory is one he will always be able to carry with him — his Aggie ring.

"I remember when I got my ring," Choi said. "It felt good, like I accomplished something."

From taking their first test to participating in Elephant Walk, seniors have become experts on living college. Caffey said her best advice to new students is to take a semester at a time.

"Don't pressure yourself deciding what exactly you do when you get out of college," Caffey said, "because what you do back to when I was a freshman is not even the same person today."

Foster said she suggests letting themselves experience new people and not making a habit of living with their best friends.

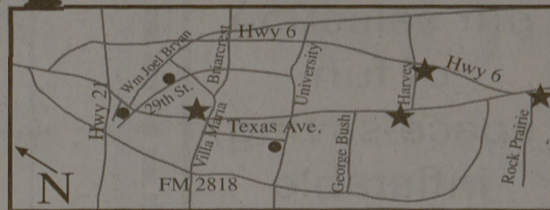

"Whenever you meet really good friends, you're not always the person you expected," he said.

... Thanks for the memories from the Aggie Club. They made a good dinner when checks bounced. I just want to thank you for your support while I've been in college. I've had the best of my life.

Laurie Nickel, student body president, Fish Camp counselor and a senior business analysis major, checks in Daniel Simmons, a freshman finance major, at Fish Camp this summer.
