The College of Education witnessed increased interest and participation in its second annual Open House yesterday afternoon.

Becky Carr, assistant dean for the Department of Academic Affairs, estimated that 100 people visited the open house, which was an increase from last year.

Mary Hugebeck, administrative assistant in the Department of Educational Curriculum and Instruction, said increased faculty and student involvement and advertising through flyers and invitations all contributed to the growth of this year's open house.

Faculty from each department within the College of Education and about 20 graduate students were present to help make the open house a success.

Dr. Joyce Juntune, a faculty-education psychologist, a science teacher, in his consideration of going to graduate school.

Fidel Fernandez, program coordinator in the Office of Graduate Studies, said the application process for graduate school can be intimidating for people who have been out of school for several years. "A lot of individuals are afraid of

MINORITIES

The Hopwood decision ruled that schools in Texas could not use race as a factor for enrollment and financial aid.

A press release stated the Fall 1998 figures "are still below the peak 290 African-American students enrolled in 1994 and 891 Hispanic students enrolled in 1995 before the federal Hopwood decision."

"We would like a representative student body," Engelage said. "We are under represented in African-

AMERICAN AND HISPANIC STUDENTS.

Engelage said that the percentage of minorities in the professional fields and primary schools are raising.

"You look into the work world, there aren't going to be all Anglos, especially in urban areas," Engelage said. "And the elementary and high schools are not an all white majority in Texas and California."

Additionally, Asian student enrollment raised to 259 students compared to 224 in Fall 1997. American Indian student population raised from 29 students in Fall 1997 to 38 students in Fall 1998.

Students should report suspicious activity at or near bicycle racks to UPD by calling 845-2345.

If a bike is stolen on campus, baron said students should contact the UPD immediately.
