A&M students find creative ways to deal with life without mode of transport

BY JEFF KEMPF
The Battalion

Imagine, it's Saturday morning, the Lucky Charms are beckoning for milk, and, Oh no!, the carton is empty.

A quick run to the grocery store would solve this problem, but wait, there is no car to get there.

This may sound like a nightmare, but luckily those individuals with a car do not have such problems.

With a vehicle, a person is able to be free and spontaneous and get things done whenever duty calls.

What about those who do not share in the joy of owning a car? Buying groceries and getting a haircut is a hassle, and many day-to-day activities, taken for granted by the car-owning public, are seen as distress for those who are vehicle deficient.

The automobile has been viewed as a life saver since its inception by Henry Ford in the early 1900's.

Ford had a dream that every American could enjoy driving around in assembly line Model-T cars.

Somehow, his idea of economically priced cars for the average American was lost over the years.

Surprisingly, even in the '90s, many college students are without a car.

They must rely on the physical fitness of their two legs or the pedal and gear machinery of a bicycle to reach their destination.

For some, the only feasible way to travel to school is by bus.

Amanda Wade, a sophomore management major, said she tried the bus system to get to class, and later gave it up.

"I had to get to the bus stop 10 minutes early because you never knew what time the bus was coming," Wade said. "I would ride the bus, but I would get dropped off 20 miles from my nearest class."

To some students, the Texas A&M bus system may not be that reliable, but it is better than walking and is the only option for a student if campus is too far from home.

Other activities such as off-campus volunteering, are pertinent to college students.

Many students interested in volunteering time and effort, find they are limited because they are without a car.

Nathan Smith, a sophomore biomedical science major, said he thought he had the no-car problem solved.

"I am glad to be on campus right now because everything is so readily available, but the main problem I face is trying to volunteer," he said. "Since I don't have a car, I must volunteer on other people's schedules."

Classes and on-campus activities may come to an end with the close of the day; however, social events are always happening around the clock.

Heather Zoric, a freshman general studies major, said she hates being so needy with her friends and their car.

"After joining a sorority, it has been hard to always depend on and find a ride to Monday night meetings," she said. "I find the same two people are always driving me around and trust me, I know they would rather be doing something else."

Fortunately, there are a few remedies to the depression of not owning a car.

Making fun of the car who got their 100th graduation from Parking Traffic and Transportation Services, many some of the no-car blues.

They may not appreciate a joke, but that is not the point. In addition students great deal of money by putting gas into an automobile frequent basis.

Since spending the money would require where in a car, start to cash and look toward chases in the future.

Smith said he has other positive aspects without a car.

"I know one thing, have a car, it definitely stolen," he said.
