•Disc Golf provides thrifty pastime gains popularity among students.

In the '90s, many ordinary sports have been altered in order to gain the interest of the young sports-loving population. One of the rising leisure activities in America is disc golf.
 With the traditional golf-playing concepts in mind, disc golf is a fast-paced sport. Such popularity has spawned the Professional Disc Golf Association (PDGA), which trains officials, sanctions competitions and regulates game play.
 The objective of the game is to complete a course from beginning to end in the fewest number of throws of the disc. The player begins each hole at a tee box and must try to reach a basket which serves as the hole in disc golf. Obstacles, such as trees and water, commonly found on the disc golf course, make accuracy and precision important skills for a successful run.
 Jared McCullogh, a sophomore general studies major, said there are more than trees to overcome on the course.
 "Some courses require the player to advance across a street," he said. "The concrete of the road and sidewalks then become penalty areas, not to mention the cars."
 The game is a constant challenge, has a very social nature and requires good physical and mental conditioning. It is also very inexpensive and is a recreational sport for everybody, regardless of age, gender or ability.

 McCullogh said he enjoys the game as a stress reliever.
 "It is fun to go play with your friends and forget about classes, tests and homework," McCullogh said. "It is always a stress relief when you get to talk and chat with your friends."
 Disc golf courses can range anywhere from nine to 27 holes, but 18 is the average course length.
 Courses are usually located in wooded areas. Water traps and naturally rough terrain add to the difficulty of the game, but courses are available for play all year long.
 Wes Wyatt, a senior speech communications major, said there are not many places available to play the game.
 "Research Park is the only place in town to find a disc golf course. The course is an 18-hole course with good obstacles and game play," Wyatt said. "There are a couple of tees in which you must throw over water, but all in all, the trees pose the biggest hurdle."
 Wyatt said he sees many different people at the park in College Station, and the diversity of individuals showing up to play increases daily.
 "Most people probably think only students go out there to play," he said. "I see husbands, wives, boyfriends who bring their girlfriends and Dads with groups of kids."
 One downside to the traditional game of golf can be the cost involved. Disc golf exchanges the price of expensive clubs and discs. A player will look for a "green fee" when looking to play.

 The center of attention is the disc. A valuable object is the disc. Specific guidelines must be followed when purchasing or using a disc.
 Some detailed specifications were described on the website. To be legal in play, a disc must have a diameter of 17.5 to 18.5 inches, a flight plate, be made of plastic material without any metal components, not be more than 2.25 centimeters or greater in thickness and not exceed 8.3 grams in weight.
 Most manufactured discs are made to meet the regulations. Game players should have a disc on hand to try to find a legal disc.
 McCullogh said the disc is only true cost in playing the game.
 "Local retailers carry discs you would need to begin playing," he said. "There are a couple of discs. The cost ranges from $20 a disc."
 Like a club in the traditional game, there are specialized discs.
 "There is the 'putter' which is heavy and has a flat lip," he said. "This is easier to control than also 'drivers' used for long distances. These discs are made of more rigid plastic."
 Fortunately, the equipment for the game does not require a caddy or an expensive bag. Players usually carry their own supplies.

PUCKER UP!

Before Valentine's Day this year, learn more about the history of the kiss and impress your date with your knowledge rather than just your ability to lock lips.

Dr. Vaughn Bryant, a Texas A&M anthropology professor, will lead an engaging discussion about the origin and history of the kiss on Feb. 10 at 7 p.m. in 212 MSC.

Free kisses will be given to everyone who attends.
