Lecture series increases healthy eating awareness

Linda Kapusniak, author of Guide to Low-Fat Dining in the Brazos Valley, will offer low-fat-food tips today during the Healthy Living Lecture Series presentation at 5:30 p.m. in 280 Student Recreation Center.

Kapusniak said her presentation will focus on healthy food choices at restaurants, government regulations and home meal replacement.

The government regulations monitor the terminology restaurants use to refer to low-fat menu items, and meal-replacement systems allow customers to view and select items to purchase and have freshly prepared by professional chefs.

DeAun Woosley, fitness director at the Rec Center, said the Healthy Living Lecture Series is an opportunity for students to learn ways to lead healthier lifestyles.

"This program gives students an opportunity to discover which restaurant and fast food chains in town are low fat, contain hidden fat and which ones contain items that are healthy," Woosley said. "Every restaurant has low-fat items, but some don't advertise it as much as others."

Kapusniak said the frequency of Americans dining in restaurants and the general lack of knowledge about low-fat eating influenced her to write the book.

"Americans do a lot of eating out, and some have a hard time going out to eat and believing that they can eat low fat, mostly because of a lack of general knowledge and information," Kapusniak said.

Woosley said this program will give students a chance to hear a well-known author from the Brazos Valley.

"Linda Kapusniak is a well known author and dietitian in the Brazos Valley," Woosley said. "We don't often have authors that will come to the lecture series and speak for free, so this is a good opportunity."

Kapusniak's guide, which contains low-fat eating tips for 125 restaurants in the Brazos Valley, will be for sale at the end of March.

Film depicts traditional Baptist views, sparks debate

BY APRIL YOUNG

Tension within the Southern Baptist faith and women's struggles against the oppression by male religious leaders were the foci of a presentation sponsored by Gender Issues Education Services.

The film, "Battle for the Minds," which was part of Gender Issues Education Service's celebration of Women's History Month, was centered around the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary in Louisville.

The film showed the extent to which many male ministers and members of the Southern Baptist Convention went to justify their views about the position women should hold in the church.

Linda Cortina, a freshman biology major, said the film showed the many ways the Bible can be read.

"This film proved that the Bible is open to interpretation and you can use it to support any issue," Cortina said. "You can use it to support slavery or you can use it to support women's position in the church," she said.

The Southern Baptist Convention allowed women to enter the ministry but not as pastors. In a 1984 resolution, it was declared that women could not hold positions of leadership in the Southern Baptist Convention.

Many members of the convention said they believed that women who wanted to rise to the position of pastor had misunderstood God's calling in their life and that it was a delusion for women to think they would serve as a minister in the church.

Natalie Wilson, a volunteer in Gender Issues Education Services and freshman zoology major, said the presentation taught her about the structure of the Southern Baptist Convention.

"I am not Baptist, but I learned a lot about the structure of the Baptist Convention," Wilson said. "It's extremely political, and I was not aware of that," she said.

"The terror of women becoming equal was very obvious in the men's speech," said Elizabeth Dungan, a volunteer in Gender Issues Education Services and an English major.

Tricia Draughn, coordinator of the film series and a graduate assistant for Gender Issues Education Services, said the film displayed strides women have taken to overcome obstacles they have faced.

"The film shows there have been gains for women having leadership roles in religious fields and that you have to remember it takes little steps to reach equality," she said.
