How to start planning for next year's Spring Break today

As scores of students return from an active and generally sober Spring Break, their minds quickly turn back to concentrating on the things they have missed most — schoolwork and schedules. Students are often so enthusiastic about getting back into the classroom rut that they neglect proper time to ponder ways to make next year's Spring Break even better.

Some topics to consider are preparation for whatever trip you may embark on, choosing various locations to vacation and what to do about the generous increase in subject workload over the holidays.

Spring Break traveling is becoming more and more impulsive. Students have been known to skip town in search of adventure at the slightest change in weather, at the onset of boredom and on receiving the results of paternity tests.

With regard to these travel trends, the only real preparation one must make for Spring Break is to leave early. Of course, the definition of "early" varies for each individual. Some believe that leaving "early" means departing two to three hours ahead of schedule. The majority, however, consider "early" to be two to three days ahead of schedule.

One may experience some difficulty in helping his or her professor to understand the need to leave early. It is hard to convincingly articulate the complexity and puzzling details of Spring Break travel.

One way of conveying this information is to maintain eye contact with the professor and speak clearly and firmly, occasionally complementing his or her physique. At the end of the discourse, the student should extend a hand in a gesture of camaraderie and goodwill — this last step usually involves losing $20 to $50 and, for once, Aggie Bucks are not accepted.

The only other known method of getting away with an "early" departure is to invest in the human cloning industry. If one decides to do so, make sure to create a clone that is not overtly genetically mutated and yet looks remotely similar to oneself.

Just imagine a conversation between your professor and your not-so-well-made clone.

JACOB HUVAL

ROBERT HYNEXER/THE BATTALION

Professor: "Mr. Huval, why do you look like John Lovitz?"

Clone: "Because I'm so happy to be in your class and not in Cancun!"

Professor: "Then why do you have a third arm and a lightbulb in your forehead?" It is at this point that the clone would spend a moment pointing out the minute changes apparent on the new twenty-dollar bill while asking, "Have you been working out?"

The next step to a terrific Spring Break is location, location, location. A popular destination is the beach, where many vacationers spend the week working on their tans, swimming and testing their alcohol tolerance levels.

If vacationing in Galveston, a group can easily stay entertained all week by seeing who can walk the beach and collect the most syringes.

Another common destination among Spring Breakers is ski slopes. The most complicated aspect for beginners is getting on the ski lift. Usually, it is difficult to determine if one has boarded the lift properly until halfway up the mountain.

Here is a tip: When the approaches, if one feels a sharp, painful, pole-shaped sensation in the buttocks, and this sensation continues throughout the ride, it is safe bet that one did not board correctly.

Despite the exhilaration of skiing, attendance at ski resorts has dramatically declined since the deaths of numerous famous sons in skiing-related incidents.

One resort reported finding a note outside its front door that read, "Unless all logging is immediately stopped, we will continue to stop one celebrity each week. No no such thing as a skiing accident — signed, The Trees."

Resort designers hope to increase interest in skiing by constructing theme-park-like resorts such as The Compound, The Slide, The Widow Maker and the Cape the Donner Party.

For many students, the best of Spring Break is coming home to school (where else are they going to find a quality humor magazine?)

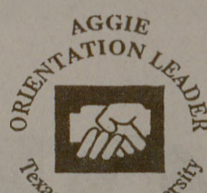

Unfortunately, the usual assignments amount to some of the just below being assigned to write like reciting the Declaration of Independence through interdependence, writing a thesis on the subject "Why?" and reading the most of the Library of Congress in Pig Latin.

If and when confronted by a professor as to where the assignment is, one should first recite the traditional excuse, "My car!"

If and when the professor presses his doubt of the student's claim, one should then recite the truth: "Okay, okay! Late in the night, Mike and I were out of money and Mike spilled salsa on it! Have you been working out?"

Jacob Huval is a freshman English major.
