Art of conversation poses numerous challenges

Picture the following scenario: a party, be it frat, business, church, voodoo or tea. Someone approaches with a smile and an outstretched hand. What is the proper response?

As with all things, action is ascertained by atmosphere. In other words, the occasion dictates the reaction. At a frat party, the proper response would be to perform the secret handshake, recite the sacred passage and use the frat decoder ring to find out this week's fabulous surprise on the back of the kiddie meal.

At a business party, the correct response would be to force a smile, share some gossip and either pretend or aspire to be someone important, depending on the person addressed.

The point is, conversation is a matter of choice, a myriad of ups and downs, shakes and nods, smiles and frowns and laughs and sobs that congregate to form the final product of a truly profound statement.

The correct choices must be made so that when the aforementioned scenario does occur (and it will), one will make a lasting impression of personal intelligence, understanding and professionalism instead of stating "I like blue! Me hungry now!"

The art of intelligent conversation is pop culture's most neglected aspect of communication — second only to four feet of string and two tin cans.

Intelligent conversation has taken a tremendous downfall among today's youth, as well as yesterday's youth, which are, coincidentally, today's youth yesterday or yesterday's youth next Tuesday only during a leap year.

People of all ages and of numerous anatomical variations have lost either the ability or the will to instigate and maintain coherent, intelligent conversation. One can hardly walk into or out of a grocery store without being hailed by inane statements like, "Hey, you have to pay for that!"

An inherent problem is the magnitude of choices that must be made in the course of a conversation. The most obvious choice is vocabulary, choosing one word over another, looking for the right combination to articulate the message most efficiently.

To a very few elite's knowledge, there exist words that can convey up to three separate ideas at once.

For instance, the combination of "four-legged, high-backed and scootable" can be summarized into the word chair. "Wooden, writes well and always numbered condensed into pencil. And "thin, folds easily" can be taken to mean Manson.

Another important aspect of conversation is body language.

Keep in mind that this refers to sent by posture, not the "body language" one receives from the stomach after "You idiot! Why did you eat all of that sausage and picante?! I'll make you sick come 2 a.m.!"

It cannot be stressed enough that body language can uplift even the
