American Pie Starring Jason Biggs and Chris Klein

Playing at Hollywood 16

If Sara Lee has any sense in her cheesecake-consistency brain, she would jump on the opportunity to do American Pie promotions. Shame that its target audience is too young to get into the theater to watch it.

American Pie's four hormonally challenged central characters make a pact to lose their virginity at all costs by graduation. But as with any virginity movie, good or bad, the girls don't seem to be cooperating.

Pie's hype revolves around its disturbingly funny take on teenage sexual antics.

Thankfully the film doesn't rely on baked goods to deliver all the story. The cast of virtual unknowns are given the chance to break out of the mold of horny teenagers, and all four deliver performances that ring true to the modern-day high school experience.

Appearances can be deceiving. This is what Michael Faraday (Bridges), a professor of American History at George Washington University, finds when his friendly and quiet suburban neighbor turns out to be a political terrorist.

Arlington Road, directed by Mark Pellington, entertains audiences while depicting a disturbing but all-too-real imitation of life in the age of technology, political unrest and social terrorism.

This film opens on a violent note as Faraday is returning home one evening. Ironically, he finds his neighbors' child near death after playing with explosives. This sets the stage for a friendship between the two families that becomes tragic as Faraday learns the truth about his neighbor, Oliver Lang (Robbins) and his
