Official aims to lower rate of insurance

AUSTIN (AP) — Insurance Commissioner Jose Montemayor announced a statewide push yesterday to find cheaper rates for good drivers living in areas typically overlooked by insurers.

The crux of Montemayor's campaign — "Good Rates for Good Drivers" — is a program that was established last year targeting drivers living in areas the state identified as underserved by insurers.

"There are many Texans out there with good driving records unnecessarily paying more than their fair share of the premium dollars," he said.

The Market Assistance Program covers drivers in 382 ZIP codes across Texas in both rural and urban areas. Most are overwhelmingly low-income and high minority regions, Montemayor said.

Some consumer groups have accused the insurance industry of redlining or racial discrimination of customers.

The industry denies the charge and Montemayor said the department's investigations "haven't turned up a group insurance officials conspiring to exclude somebody."

"The insurance industry has looked at it and don't necessarily find a problem with it," Montemayor said. "I on the other hand have studied this and am convinced that the truth lies somewhere in between."

D.J. Powers, attorney for the Center of Economic Justice, said while he is encouraged that the department recognizes a problem, it is not enough.

The state should take a hard line with insurance companies, he said. "The data is unequivocal. Insurers in Texas are redlining," Powers said.

Jerry Johns, president of the Southwestern Insurance Information Service, denied the redlining charge and said the industry supports Montemayor's efforts.

ADDRESS

A comprehensive transportation package and a community recycling program are other initiatives Hurd intends to outline in the address.

"I hope students will get excited, because student government is going to be doing some visible things to improve life on campus," he said. "I hope people go away asking what they can do to help make Texas A&M a better university."

BICYCLE

aimed at helping Aggies move around campus and reduce their stress by eliminating the fear of having a bicycle stolen or worrying about locking it up.

FRESHMEN

Mia Warner, a co-chair for the Leaders in Freshman Engineering (LIFE) and a junior chemical engineering major, said freshmen need to consider their interests and goals from the beginning of their first semester at A&M.

"You never know what you might do," Warner said she advises freshmen to take academics seriously at the same time keeping their options open.
