policies are necessary to provide a high level of care for students.

"I think we have been successful," she said. "The average student who comes in here to see a physician waits less time to see a doctor than I do."

Bill Kibler, associate vice president for student affairs, said the policies, which have prompted these arguments, were instituted by Isdale when she took her current position in 1995 in an attempt to help Beutel better deal with the student population.

"Dr. Isdale has done a wonderful job enhancing the student experience at Beutel because she values the students' concerns above those of her staff," Kibler said. "Because of that, student complaints have dropped dramatically."

Kibler said many physicians working at Beutel did not like the additional hours and stricter regimentation imposed by Isdale and because of that, chose to leave or were fired.

According to a report by the A&M Human Resources Department, the number of employees who have left Beutel per year has increased 40.3 percent since Isdale's assignment to Beutel in 1995.

Krueger said this increase has left Beutel searching for qualified physicians, which often ends in the hiring of temporary or "contract" physicians who practice until a permanent physician can be found. She said this search often leaves Beutel with less than its full staff of 11 practitioners.

She said this shortage adds to the already-strained staff whose practitioner-to-student ratio is one to 3,900, the lowest practitioner-to-student ratio among Big 12 schools.

The American College Health Association says that for every 2,500 students, a doctor should be available. At Beutel, one doctor to 400 students, A&M's ratio is by almost 1,400 students per doctor.

Kibler said that while there are currently two nurse practitioners who adequately care for students, there are only two physician assistants who are currently employed at Beutel.

"Dr. Isdale is always experimenting with the make-up of the staff to find what is most effective, as well as what is most cost-effective," Kibler said. "If she needed more practitioners, she would be banging on my door asking for more. The fact is that the numbers she has maintained are an efficient and effective way to care for students."

Freeman said he may one day return to Beutel if administrative policies change, but he is happier working elsewhere.

"I miss working with the students," Freeman said. "I miss working with the students by nature polite and intellectual and at Beutel a wonderful place to work, but it just really wasn't worth the pain in the administration."
