Maggies aims to unite female leaders

Mileana Warns, a senior food and science technology major, was involved in many campus organizations last year including adviser to Freshman Leaders In Progress (FLIP), when she decided there should be an organization for women similar to Ol' Ags and created Maggies.

"Last year, I started thinking about what I wanted to do my senior year," she said. "A lot of my guy friends had joined organizations like Ol' Ags and Old Army and I thought that would be really cool to bring together girl leaders from all over campus."

Warns said she shared this idea with Tim Sweeney, director of student activities, and he pointed her in the direction of Heather Johnson, former president and founder of Ladies Leadership Society and a senior mathematics major.

Johnson and Warns joined forces to begin the foundation for Maggies. Maggies is an organization for women leaders all over campus which focuses on community service.

"We wanted to combine all the women leaders from all over campus," Warns said.

"The criteria was that the girls had to be at least sophomores with leadership experience and a dynamic personality."

"We realized how much potential we would have using every woman's strengths and resources to accomplish something."

Four directors were chosen to head up Maggies which began taking new members this fall. "One hundred and fifty girls applied and 75 were chosen." Warns said. "The criteria was that the girls had to be at least sophomores with leadership experience and a dynamic personality."

Johnson said it is encouraging to see incredible women finally together.

"This is an avenue for the women on campus to get to know each other and to get girls involved in other leadership organizations. This is our chance to give back to the community."

Sheridan Alford, a new member of Maggies and a sophomore general studies major, is excited about the new organization and is glad that she joined.

"It has given me a chance to meet people that aren't necessarily in the same organizations I am in," she said. "There are so many leadership skills to learn from them."

Maggies has various community service projects lined up across the area and is also planning social events for the year including a charity dance.
