District renames Special Olympics

Powell will be honored in Fort Worth

FORT WORTH (AP) — Chad Powell, who lost his life in the bonfire collapse at Texas A&M, was an accomplished distance runner at Keller High School and a Special Olympics volunteer.

His mother, Jill Powell, said he learned from the athletes' determination to overcome their disabilities.

Now, the school district plans to remember the Aggie and alum by renaming its Special Olympics the Chad Powell Memorial Special Olympics Track Meet, said Genni LaPlante, director of special education for the Keller district.

"He truly in his daily life exemplified what we desire in a volunteer for the Special Olympics because of the way he opened his heart and since he did volunteer every year of his high school career, I wanted to dedicate this to Chad," LaPlante said.

A ceremony is scheduled for Tuesday. Jill Powell said the students taught her son and he taught them.

"He understood the special relationship that people can develop between special needs people," she said.

News in Brief

3 Harvey traffic signals to be shut down

The City of College Station's Electrical and Traffic Signal departments will shut down power to three, traffic signals on Harvey Road.

The intersections affected include:

- George Bush East Drive/Harvey Road
- Dartmouth Street/Harvey Road

- Munson Avenue/Harvey Road (tentative)

The intersections will be done one at a time and will be out for no longer than five minutes. Police officers will direct traffic while the power is out.

The power is being interrupted to change the electrical power from overhead to underground.

FACULTY

lack of female faculty at the upper level.

With the lack of female faculty on campus female students also experience a lack of role models and mentors. The lack of female role models and mentors is an issue that female students must address not only as professors in their classes, but as advisers in organizations.

"I've been given numerous opportunities to work with faculty members throughout the year and in all of them the advisers have been male," said Andrea Perrard a sophomore political science major.

"At times I wish that I had a woman faculty member to relate to and inspire the other female students into taking a more active leadership part, thereby lessening the intimidation often felt by a male authority figure," Perrard said.

While there are female faculty here at A&M, there are so few that some female students feel it is difficult to get in touch with them.

"With the activities I've been involved in on campus, I've had the opportunity to work with some amazing female faculty members," said Suzanne Tate a senior journalism major. "I think it takes actively seeking these women out and then taking the time to get to know them."

RUN-OFF

Ashlea Jenkins, election commissioner and a junior political science major, said that for the past several months, she has been meeting with various people about the inaccuracy of the mathematical formula previously used.

"The decision to define it [differently] was made at 5 p.m. Thursday when polling sites closed down. It's always been a decision I've had to make," she said. "As soon as I got to Measurement and Research Services at 5 [p.m.], I said 'This is how I'm going to define it.' That's the mathematically sound way to define it."

No votes had been tallied at the time the decision was made.

"I knew I had to do it before any votes were counted to preserve the integrity of the election," she said. "That's my job as an election commissioner — to provide impartiality."

The Election Commission is not required to notify the yell leaders or any other organization participating in the elections of changes in the way the commission decides to conduct the election.

"We feel like the candidates and everyone involved should have been informed of what's going on," Bailey said.

Will Hurd, student body president and a senior computer science major, said he supports the Election Commission's decision to use the new system to determine the majority.

"It was a relational faux pas on our part, not telling the yell leaders about the change," he said. "But there is no place mandated in the election regulations that it needs to be communicated by the election commissioner."

"It was a relational faux pas on our part, not telling the yell leaders about the change. But there is no place mandated in the election regulations that it needs to be communicated by the election commissioner."

The following students will be honored:

Charles Edward Williams
(Political Science major)

Amanda Jeanne Ritchie
(Agricultural Business major)

The Silver Taps ceremony will be held tonight at 10:30 in front of the Academic Building. The ceremony is to honor those students who have passed away while enrolled.
