reached, the students will be charged a 5 cents per page.

Clint Cobb, a junior agricultural development major, said he is worried that being required to print information for his classes will cause him to exceed his quota.

"It would be easy to use 200 pages when you're writing papers and printing out notes," Cobb said. "I've had to print about 50 pages in my English class and at least 200 pages of notes in my philosophy class."

Putnam estimates that only a portion of students will exceed their set number of pages and be required to pay extra.

"We estimate [that at the current print rates] only 25 percent [of students] will exceed their quota, and only 10 percent [of students] will pay six dollars after they exceed their quota," Putnam said.

Option two is to take the $382,000 per year and apply it to the total cost of printing, leaving students to pay 3.5 cents via their fee statement for each page they print.

Cantrell said the students he has spoken to seem to prefer the quota option of the plan. Cobb said that he, too, would prefer the quota system.

"It's stupid to have a quota because you would meet your quota in just two classes," he said. "But if I had to choose, I would rather the quota than paying every time."

Putnam said he expects the printing rates will go down when the quotas or costs are put into effect.

"Now some people print a lot, and other students pay for it," Putnam said. "[Under the new plan] people who print a lot will pay for it."

are sick or for rainy days. [And], eventually, we want to use unoccupied channels, channels 82-87, to install a Residence Hall Cinema, which would charge students an optional fee to view so many movies."

There is a chance for revenue sharing, Cushman said.

In addition to all the free services CTN would provide for A&M, CTN may share some of the revenue it earns from the students viewing its programs.

"CTN is sort of a stepping stone for AGY-TV (a student-run television station) that the RHA eventually hopes to implement," Cushman said. "I would like to see [CTN] be successful and I hope other students will support it too."
