Tests train wolves not to eat livestock

WASHINGTON (AP) — Captive wolves in Montana are being trained to shun cattle in favor of natural prey such as buffalo in an experiment in which the wolves are zapped with an electric shock when they approach the livestock.

The federal agencies and private groups involved say they are trying to avoid killing the wolves, which belong to an endangered species that has been reintroduced to the wild from Canada. Critics call the experiment cruel and say that Western ranchers, not wolves, are the ones that need to be modified.

"We think it's absolutely ridiculous that we should be trying to alter the natural behavior of wild animals, particularly to benefit a private industry that uses public lands," said Andrea Lococo of the Fund for Animals.

Government-funded livestock protection programs all but wiped out gray wolves from the Lower 48 states by the 1960s. After the wolves were put on the endangered species list, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service began breeding them and reintroducing them into the wild in 1995.

Now, more than 250 released wolves and their offspring live in the northern Rocky Mountains and more than 20 are in the Southwest. The Fish and Wildlife Service has proposed taking the species off the endangered list.

Under the reintroduction program, wolves that repeatedly attack livestock can be killed.

The three wolves involved in the Montana experiment — one about a year old and two that are 2 years old — were part of a pack that repeatedly attacked livestock during the spring and summer. Eight wolves in the pack were shot and the pack's lead female died while struggling to avoid being collared as part of the experiment.

The three juvenile wolves are being kept in a half-acre enclosure on the Flying D Ranch in southwestern Montana which is owned by media mogul Ted Turner. The wolves are fitted with collars that can provide both an annoying noise and a mild electric shock. Researchers then put a calf into the pen wearing a transmitter that gives the wolves shocks if they get "within biting distance" of the calf, explained John Shivik, the Agriculture Department researcher leading the project. The calf was unharmed, even after researchers left it in the pen with the wolves overnight.

Officials now plan on releasing the wolves back into the wild in mid-October, said Ed Bangs, who heads the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service's wolf recovery program in Montana.

News in Brief

Movie industry to reduce violence aimed at youth

WASHINGTON (AP) — The movie industry acted Tuesday to curtail the amount of violent entertainment targeted at underage youth in the wake of a scathing report that found Hollywood guilty of undermining its own rating system.

The Motion Picture Association of America said eight major movie studios would ask theater owners not to show ads for R-rated films during G-rated movies and would not include people under age 17 in focus groups for R-rated movies without a parent.

The studios also have pledged to review their marketing and advertising practices so as not to target inappropriately R-rated movies at children. The companies will appoint senior executive compliance officers to review these efforts.

"I think we are starting a new era that didn't exist before," said MPA president Jack Valenti, who coordinated the initiative among the various movie companies. "We're going to take a fresh look at the way we market our films."

Valenti said the industry would try to provide reasons for the ratings of films in print advertising and movie Web sites. Videos and DVDs for sale or rental also will include explanations of film ratings. The movie studios are pressing theater owners to enforce the ratings system better.

The Walt Disney Co., DreamWorks SKG, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Paramount Pictures, Sony Pictures Entertainment, Twentieth Century Fox, Universal Studios and Warner Bros. all signed on to the agreement.
