BITE

Continued from

The library remains open lined with posters warning about the bats. As of Tuesday workers were still trying to get bats. A few persistent students still studying on the sixth floor most of the bats are located.

"We will take more primary measures to seal," Stephenson said.

He said the sixth floor is reassembled from the renovation and several sections of the are closed for work.

Gilreath said in the press that students should remain in that is a student feels uncomfortable going to the sixth floor to get material, they can make requests the items at the main circulation.

Eric Zimmerman, a Brazos ty agent of the Texas Agricultural Service, said bats are naturally aggressive.

"Very, very seldom are aggressive," he said. "Unless provoked or there was a commotion find it odd that she would get especially in the area of the foot."

Stephenson was unable to offer details about how the biting happened. Zimmerman said some caves have as many as 20 million living in them, but despite the large population, the incidence of rabies is relatively low.

"Bat bites should always be considered potential exposure [to rabies] and treated accordingly," he said.

Zimmerman said the Mexican freetail bat migratory. Its wings about 4 inches long with a wingspan of 11 to 13 inches.

In the meantime, Gilreath asks students to remain calm and to attempt to capture the bats.

WATCH

choice — Democrats.

Toshia Wetzel, a senior agricultural development major in dance, said that although the debate did not change her vote, it did help her to better see the difference between the two candidates.

"The debate made Bush look more of a 'dumb ass' than I thought in the past," she said.

The most important point made in the debate was probably that Bush was from the big government in Washington; he's from Texas."

Following the debate, Dr. Paul Hurlley, a political science professor led several students in a discussion about the debate and whether it affected their votes.

"Based on the responses, the debate did not effect most people because most people said they were in with a candidate preference and body was converted to another candidate preference," she said.
