Brabo said. "In fact, I like wearing them because you can tell immediately if someone is supposed to be on campus." McGowen said he thinks the badges will work because they will allow a faculty member to identify a student and they will create a much more personable atmosphere on campus. Brabo, who student teaches history and science, said the hardest part will be getting the students to wear the badges. "The faculty and staff are required to wear their badges now to show modeling behavior for the students," said McGowen. "We feel that the students will be more accepting to the wearing badges if the people enforcing wearing them as well." Brabo said students who come to class out visible identification are sent to a detention center, where they can purchase a new badge for $5 or remain in the detention center for the day.
