DEBATE

major, said she has already seen the positive effects of the display this week.

"It creates the opportunity for discussion," she said. "In my classes, before class, after class, [abortion] has been coming up more in response to the large graphic displays."

Wilson said there are people who will not be influenced by the displays, but she said many people will have the opportunity to make a well-educated decision because of the availability of information this week.

"I think if you get radically anti-choice people, the discussion may be civil, but it never moves anyplace because they have their minds made up," she said. "What's useful is the discussion that takes place between moderates who don't have a stance on the issue yet."

Woodson calls people opposed to abortion "anti-choice," not "pro-life."

"They don't want women to have the right to choose," Woodson said. "They want it government-mandated that [a choice] can't be made. Pro-life is more encompassing than this issue."

Woodson said she was unsure what to expect this week when she learned of plans for the display.

"I wasn't really surprised," she said. "At this point, I expected something like this because I know how strongly they believe in this."

Woodson said, no matter how strongly the two groups differ in opinion or doctrine, the campus has an opportunity to learn and grow from this week's events.

"It has brought to our attention what people on this campus are concerned about — information," Woodson said.

It is information, Woodson said, that both groups hope to give the student body.

Kelly said there are other opportunities for the campus to progress this week, and students should stand by the beliefs while listening to the beliefs of others.

"I think this can have a definite positive on this campus and group," she said. "This is a really active campus if you're a publican. It is good to see pro-activism that is not... Republican."

Kelly said A&M is starting to make equal-rights headway.

"There are so many issues that need to be worked on," Kelly said. "I do think A&M is making progress very slowly, but surely."

"Someone that is committed to abstinence not going to relinquish that just because they have been handed a condom."

— Margaret Griffith, health education coordinator

Credit cards can also be used to purchase products, which are then passed to the customer. The site also includes information about what to do if a condom breaks.

Margaret Griffith, health education coordinator for A&M Student Health Services, said National Condom Week does not discourage abstinence.

"Someone that is committed to abstinence is not going to relinquish that just because they have been handed a condom," Griffith said.

Someone who is going to have sex with or without protection, she said, a condom may make a difference.

APPLICANTS

The application process is smooth, and the admission is ahead of where it was last year, Baldwin said.

The admissions office is receiving applications in the number of the large number of applicants, admissions breaks applications down by department, Baldwin said.

Even though there is a number of applicants, the '05 will be the same size year's freshman class.

"We are not finished yet still receiving applications in 2001, but we expect to admit number as last year," Garza said.
