be as much as 25 hours behind the winner.

University teams—including Canada and England—made up all the entries, save two: a car built by students at a Hacienda Heights high school and one entered by an Italian club.

The cost of the cars ranged from $30,000 to more than $1 million.

The race's primary sponsor is the U.S. Department of Energy. The goal is to challenge young engineers and scientists to find new ways to solve energy and transportation problems.

The race course followed what remains of Route 66 through Illinois, Missouri, Oklahoma, Texas, New Mexico, Arizona and California.

The Texas A&M Solar Power Motor Sports Team finished 27th with a time of 130:31:11.

the duck as its mascot. The health department then hired an Austin advertising firm, Tuerff-Davis EnviroMedia, to develop the campaign.

"Not only have students seen the duck, but they have heard and understood the message he brings, that tobacco is foul," Weaver said.

"The common goal is to help the duck program grow," said Tom Villarreal, a senior at Brazoswood High School. "We're working on the future of tobacco prevention in Texas."

The program comes from money the state health department received from part of the settlement reached with tobacco companies in 1998 after the state sued them to recover costs of treating sick smokers.

The duck program came out of $9 million earmarked for a study to determine the most effective ways to prevent tobacco use and promote cessation.

Students who are unsure if this particular collegiate track is right for them may take a tuition-free introductory course. If students decide that they do not want to pursue the track, the one hour course will count toward a free elective in any of the College of Science's degree plans.

"We're trying to expose as many people as possible to teaching so that those students who don't even know if it's a match can evaluate teaching as an option," Scott said.

The program has already enrolled 38 students from new student conferences, and may enroll as many as 50 before the conferences end next month.

This is not the first time controversy has surrounded the club. At a meeting to discuss plans for the club, many Bryans residents were concerned about the proposed golf course. In spite of project coordinator Tom Coyle's description of it as a "golfer's golf course," residents were displeased with the project.

At a Bryan City Council meeting in September of last year, Bryan resident Beth Price said she was unhappy with the progress of the course.

"This is not the business government," Price said. "Traditions Golf Course promoted on the basis of Bryan needed upscale residential development. Bryan spent $774,000 to get to this point, and nothing has started yet."
