the remaining issues in the spokesman Vivek Varma said. Investors, however, show some concern that the pen the Bush administration seek might still affect the next month's planned del Windows XP — which on Wall Street hope will invigorate the sluggish technology industry.

Microsoft shares finished the day down $1.72 at $5 per share.

Justice said it made the face to streamline the case bring it to an end as quickly possible. The goal, it said, was "obtain prompt, effective certain relief for consumers."

The department said it still seek a penalty that would open the operating system market to competition.

To that end, the government proposed a penalty similar some interim penalties imposed by the original trial judge, District Judge Thomas Pennington Jr.

Those would, among other things, stop Microsoft from making certain exclusive deals with partners, force computer manufacturers to keep specifications and programs of Windows computer desktop give other companies access to Windows blueprints.

Howard University law professor Andy Gavil said restrictions could be Windows XP, which has been completed by programmers won't reach stores until October.

"It's hard to square the interim remedy with Windows Gavil said.

One of Microsoft's rivals said it was happy the government plans to focus on new systems.

"What's clear today is the Department of Justice is prepared to take a hard look Windows XP and will quickly imposed remedy to up competition on the desktop AOL Time Warner executive John Buckley said.

President Bush, who last year's campaign expressed concern that Microsoft might be ruined by the antitrust case made no direct comment on legal strategy change. He said the case, "I expect the Justice Department to handle that way that brings honor and thought to the process."

White House and Justice officials said Bush had brought pressure to bear on the decision.
