international awareness.

"We are all Americans, no matter where we originate from, and we are all together in this," Glick said. "This march is for world peace. That may be idealistic, but we want to show that this campus is united."

International Student Association President Archana Ramaswamy and Student Body President Schuyler Houser will address the crowd, and students will march in a circular route around the campus that begins and ends at the Academic Plaza. A moment of silence will follow the march.

"A&M is known for Aggies and the way we stick together," said Ramaswamy, a senior accounting major. "We are united, and we come together regardless of the culture, to hold hands in this moment of sadness."

Yesterday, Houser told a group of students gathered in the MSC Flagroom that all Aggies are in mourning.

"This is undoubtedly the most tragic event on American soil of our generation," Houser said. "In our darkest times, however, we find the best in our American people, and in fact, the best in people all around the world. There are students at Texas A&M University from all 50 states and 54 countries. We are all Aggies."

The Peace March is a time for students to show their public support for one another and to grieve for the estimated 10,000 people who died in the terrorist attacks, Houser said.

The terrorists to blame for Tuesday's attacks are, in all likelihood, not affiliated with this campus, she said.

how vulnerable the mansion can be. It was reopened Wednesday for regular tours and some 400 people streamed through, receiving small American flags as they left.

The Bush administration was eager to explain Wednesday, in considerable detail, why Bush did not return immediately to Washington and take clear charge after the terrorists who struck at New York's World Trade Center turned to the nation's capital.

Throughout Tuesday, images of the Pentagon in flames — smashed by a hijacked airliner — and White House aides fleeing across Pennsylvania Avenue provided a sharp contrast with pictures of Bush heading for an underground bunker hundreds of miles away.

Fleischer said national security officials learned that both the White House and Air Force One were targets just as Bush's Boeing 747 lifted off Tuesday morning in Sarasota, Fla., where the president was to make an had announced on national television that he was hastening back to Washington. That plan was scrambled in mid-flight, and all who were aboard Air Force One — for a destination then unknown — were ordered to turn off their cell phones lest signals from the phones give away the plane's location.

At that time, there still were reports of unidentified planes in the air despite a Federal Aviation Administration order instructing all planes in U.S. airspace to land at the nearest airport, Fleischer said.

Back in Washington the White House had been evacuated and Secret Service snipers with automatic rifles sealed off a two-block perimeter. Vice President Dick Cheney remained inside the complex and was shuttled among several "secure locations," including the Situation Room in the basement of the West Wing, where he and National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice were in touch with Bush by telephone and videoconference.

"There are people in our University community that are very afraid right now of blame retaliation," she said to the crowd in Flagroom. "Reach out to them. We are Aggies. We pull together in difficult times."

Following the march, a panel of experts met with students to discuss Tuesday's attack in Rudder Auditorium.

Air Force Base in Louisiana, then to Offutt Air Force Base in Nebraska, home of the 8th Strategic Command and underground bunker with specialized equipment allowing Bush to meet via video teleconference for 65 minutes with national security team at White House.

He joined them there at the helicopter landing at Andrews Field on the South Lawn under cover of three decoy Marine choppers. Sensitive to any suggestion that Bush was in hiding at the helm, officials said at the time they were only adhering to the Secret Service and military playbook for national emergencies when they bounced Bush around from one secret destination to another. On Wednesday, Fleischer said the main plan was to land Air Force One where one expected it.

Security remained extremely tight Wednesday. Andrews, home base for the presidential air fleet. The gate was blocked by a Hummer heavy truck and a bus. Guards were armed with machine guns.
