there is still some suspicion and hostility to new technologies," he said. "Arthur Clarke once said that 98 percent of people can't tell the difference between technology and magic."

Bromley said the main distinction between science and technology, as defined by Theodore von Carman, is that science studies what is, whereas technology studies what never was. Bromley said that prior to World War II, science and technology were two completely separate departments and there was almost no relationship between science and politics and little relationship between technology and politics.

"It is remarkable how separate these three activities were when they are all essential to vital human reactions," he said. "With the development of such things as nuclear weapons, science and technology have been irretrievably merged."

Bromley said so far there have been seven major technological evolutions that have changed the face of our world, including printing, industry, nuclear, green, information biotechnology and quantum mechanics.

Bromley expressed concern that science and technology did not rank very high on President George W. Bush's agenda.

"Although health has been included, I am deeply concerned that the role played by science and technology has been deeply downplayed and not given enough thought," he said.

Bromley said most people do not realize that most of the breakthroughs from the medical world, such as nuclear magnetic resonance, are results of breakthroughs in chemistry and physics, and not the life sciences.

"It is up to the science and technology community to make the case about why we need this investment and have better articulated cooperation between federal, state and local governments," he said. "You would have to be a remarkable pessimist to not believe that we are only seeing the beginning. There are many more developments waiting out there which will pale in comparison to any of our previous discoveries."

"Aggie Allies is for all people who have issues either personally or with friends and family. We have to do with sexual orientation and life styles," Fort said. "Allies are willing to provide a safe haven and a listening ear to support all those in need."

Coming Out Week is not for GLBT students, but it gives other students on campus the chance to learn about the differences of those around them, Arniolas said.

"Coming Out Week is a chance to inform the campus community that there needs to be more for them (the GLBT community)," Arniolas said, "that they are a part of the society also."

Coming Out Week activities, programs and lectures will continue throughout the week. Tuesday's activities include a Speak Out Against Hate forum will be held in the speech area in front of Rudder Fountain from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m.

Thursday's activities include a presentation by the GLBT Lesbian, Bisexual and Transgendered (GLBTA) organization at Greek Life at 7 p.m. For additional information, go to <http://studentlife.tamu.edu>
