Another Aggie writer, a junior history major who goes by the pen name Nolan, offers a fierce insight into writing.

"I've written a book, and the book is relentless," Nolan said. "The book does not stop or yield for sensitive readers. It deals with imperative issues and inner depravity. My book will shut s—t down."

He says his book is rude, unsavory and unholy.

"There are no battles in this world except for the ones we have in our minds," Nolan said. "I have taken the darkest part of the human psyche and bundled it up within the comforting pages of a book, but the book itself offers no comfort."

The storyline is a first-person narrative told by a pedophile who kidnaps children and sells their bodies on the black market.

His book, tentatively titled Anathema, currently is unpublished. He says he will be editing for a couple more months, then he will pursue publishers.

Nolan said finding a publisher to print his book will be difficult and admits that this book is itself from an audience.

"Part of it is pushing boundaries, I want to explore untapped territories," Nolan said. "This is not user-friendly."

FOLLIES

parking on campus," Rathke said.

Marie Fontenot, a sophomore business major, came to A&M as a freshman, and as many freshman girls do, quickly noticed the wide variety and availability of the opposite sex. On one humiliating occasion, she and a friend went to the grocery store to pick up a few items.

"A few turned into a whole buggy full of groceries. It was loaded down and making the corners was tough," Fontenot said. "I saw a really cute guy standing at the end of the aisle that I needed to turn down and he was in my way, so I had an excuse to talk to him."

"I was trying to be all cute, so I said, 'excuse me,' with a little laugh and my sweetest smile," Fontenot said.

To her dismay, when she tried to turn the heavy buggy, it kept turning and the buggy crashed into the aisle and knocked a whole shelf of groceries over. The canned and boxed goods fell on her, her friend and the object of her swooning.

As the attractive guy walked away without being Fontenot pick up the mess, she was mortified and humiliated.

"My friend and I picked up the groceries, but decided to tone down my pursuing tactics in order to spare myself the embarrassment," Fontenot said.

Freshmen can spare themselves embarrassing moments by doing one of several things. They can talk to an upperclassman about what they should know before coming to A&M or about some of their own humiliations that can be avoided. There are books available on campus or at local book stores that provide information on Aggie life, as traditions one should be aware of, common phrases and events taking place on campus.

As a freshman, whether it is one's first encounter with PTTS, a disastrous flirting attempt or being in the wrong place at the wrong time, all students experience moments they would rather forget. Such times may be some of the most embarrassing humiliating incidents in one's college career, but they make for good stories and can help build character in the end.
