FIDDLE

O'Connor said he hopes the audience will find that he has a unique sound. "What I hope to accomplish at the outset is that [the audience sees] that I'm creating a different kind of American violin music," he said. "It's a sound that's new but also friendly as far as accessibility. The audience can learn a lot about me by the way I interpret the music. Especially since music is my whole life. I wear my emotions on my sleeve when I play my music."

His unique style has earned him the title "distinctly American composer." O'Connor said that American does not always mean the best as sometimes, in regards to music, European or something else might be considered the best, but that recent events have changed the connotation, and the title does not carry the baggage it did before. He said his American styling is now used for others' advantage, and he hopes people can take away something they find intrinsically valuable from his music.

O'Connor's latest recording, "The American Seasons," represents the seasons of human life. Vivaldi's "Four Seasons," and Shakespeare's "Seven Seasons of Life" were the inspiration for the piece.

"I wanted to write a seasons piece," O'Connor said. "All seasons pieces are based on Vivaldi because he was the first to do it. My cousin introduced me to Shakespeare and I decided I wanted to cover the seasons of human life."

O'Connor's "American Seasons" is divided into four main seasons: 1) Spring: infancy; 2) Summer: adolescence and coming of age; 3) Fall: maturity; 4) Winter: old age and dying.

"In American Seasons, summer, for me, is the swing rhythm of summer, which represents coming of age as swing has been America over time."

O'Connor will perform "American Seasons" Saturday at 7:30 p.m. at Rudder Theatre after The Metamorphosen Orchestra performs with their rendition of Vivaldi's "Four Seasons." The Metamorphosen Orchestra is all female, 30 and absolutely gorgeous to look at, O'Connor said. "They play with such virtuosity. The audience will see Vivaldi's Four Seasons good as it can be played."

"The audience will see where my inspiration comes from and then see my performance will be great," O'Connor said.

The Therapy Sisters

Friday, November 2nd 7:30-9:30
Unitarian Fellowship
305 Wellborn Road, College Station
Free Admission

The Therapy Sisters, a dynamic duo from Austin, will be diagnosing us with their unique talents this Friday, November 2. Maurine McLean and Lisa Rogers dispense an unusual remedy to the human condition in a musical catharsis. The original, Austin-based group doles out humor and wisdom in the form of jazz, funk, and folk music. The Ft. Worth Star Telegram calls them "better than Prozac."
Please, join us for a free evening of music and fun.
