"The election was settled a year ago, President Bush won and the voters have long since moved on," said Bush press secretary Ari Fleischer.

Against the backdrop of the disputed Nov. 7, 2000, election, the news organizations set out earlier this year to examine as many as possible of the ballots set aside as either undervotes or overvotes. Undervotes involved about 62,000 ballots where voting machines were unable to detect a choice for any presidential candidate, while about 113,000 overvotes were read by machines as possibly containing more than one choice.

PERCENTAGE

Peter Drysdale, director of undergraduate programs at Mays College of Business, said it generally targets an enrollment of 900 students each fall.

"If a student earned a 3.00 average and chose business as their first choice major by the May 1 deadline, the student was offered admission to the College of Business," Drysdale said. "That process was reviewed annually. As Mays College of Business concerned, however, it is anticipated for the 2006 freshman class."

Drysdale said that if a percent student enrolled in the College of Business, they required, like all other majors, to successfully complete requirements before upper-level courses.

"Upper-level requirements are fundamental," Drysdale said. "All lower-level business students must apply to enter upper-level major after 60 hours and successfully completing eight specific courses."

Drysdale said it is being admitted as a freshman in the College of Business and reasonably high grades in level classes.

"This is known as freshman enrollment management," Estrada said.

Estrada said there is a law governing specific that individual colleges of incoming freshmen with part of the top ten percent of their high school class. He said these students currently make up less than 70 percent for the College of Business and the College of Engineering, near 80 percent for the College of Architecture.

"We have tagged the College of Architecture as a high-priority area," Estrada said.

Estrada said numbers were monitored to ensure that the colleges not fill with only 10 percent students.
