they will not renew Curry's contract. Curry is a former graduate student of UT-Tyler and longtime reporter for the Tyler Morning Telegraph.
"No one ever told us before what information we have a right to," McClure said. "The administration has never had students question administration before."

More controversy surrounds a new Publication Administrative Council comprised solely of administrators with the power to hire and fire the newspaper faculty adviser and student editors, and "determine the character and policies of all student publications."

Student publication decisions at most schools, including Texas A&M and the University of Texas-Austin, include student input.

The Patriot staff consulted the Student Press Law Center on the legality of the administrative council.

Student Press Law Center attorney Mike Hiestand said, "What is proposed is administrative control with a lot more power than they are legally allowed."

Although the Patriot staff said administration has refused to comment to their own paper for the last two weeks, a UT-Tyler administrator told The Battalion Thursday that the process to change the policy has started already.

The administration is considering the concerns raised and has requested information from other schools on how to include students in such decisions, said Dale Landsford, UT-Tyler's vice president for student affairs. Any changes made by the Student Affairs Advisory Committee will be sent to the provost and then to the university president for final approval, he said.

Patriot editorial writer McClure wrote an inflammatory column last week denouncing the administration's "communistic" policy. Since then, she said statewide media has covered the issue and McClure said The Patriot also received a tip that a student protest will occur at the university's bell tower.

"The bell tower has become a symbol of where our investigative journalism started," McClure said.

Wreck

Krueger hit the light pole, Porter said he could see him slumped over the steering wheel.

Porter said that when Krueger hit the bus, the Bronco hit close to the bus' driver-side front tire. The car finally stopped and witnesses ran over to turn off his car and make sure he was not injured.

"The ambulance responded quickly, but he woke up by the time the ambulance got there," Porter said. "He looked like he didn't know what had happened."

The police officer who responded to the accident was required to take the names of all the students on the bus. Porter said they stayed at the accident scene for 20 to 30 minutes. Students were about 15 minutes late to class, Porter said.

Krueger's Bronco did not hit any other cars, and no other injuries were reported.

students' level.
"There's a balance between getting along with my students and having authority in the classroom," he said. "Any professor who is motivated to create that dynamic. I try to make my students comfortable participating in class by learning names and encouraging them to learn one another's names."

"He really cares about his students and puts in time with them. As a result, they benefit."

—Dr. Wendy Wood, Iuzzini's graduate adviser

Dr. Wendy Wood, Iuzzini's graduate adviser, said he's "student's professor."

"He's wonderful," she said. "He really cares about his students and puts in time with them. As a result, they benefit."

Senior psychology major Charity Breidenbach agreed.

"I had him last summer for social psych," she said. "He really wanted us to learn and not focus all our attention on our grades."

Even though he is busy working on his dissertation and teaching classes, Iuzzini is an adviser for two campus organizations. International and Students for a Free Tibet.
