Delaware judge to decide HP next move in Compaq purchase

WILMINGTON, Del. (AP) — More than seven months after Hewlett-Packard Co. announced plans to buy Compaq Computer Corp., a judge will decide what could be dissident HP director Walter Hewlett's final bid to scuttle the $19 billion deal.

Hewlett first fought the deal on the grounds that buying Compaq was too risky and would bog HP down in the weak personal-computer market at the expense of its profitable printing division.

Now, in a lawsuit against the company, Hewlett contends HP won its apparent slim majority in the March 19 shareholder vote by threatening to take business away from at least one big investor, Deutsche Bank, and by hiding unflattering information about HP and Compaq's ability to carry out the merger as well as hoped.

Opening arguments were scheduled Tuesday in Delaware Chancery Court in Wilmington, which has jurisdiction over the governance of companies such as HP that are incorporated in the state. The trial, being heard by one of the court's expert business judges and not by a judge, is expected to last three days.

HP executives are expected to testify, but it is unclear whether CEO and chairman Carly Fiorina will be among them.

"We welcome the opportunity to present our case in front of the chancellor and have the matter come to light," HP said in a statement.

"We believe when the evidence is heard, it will be clear that HP acted properly in all cases."

— Hewlett Packard statement

"We believe when the evidence is heard, it will be clear that HP acted properly in all cases."

A Hewlett spokesman said he would not return a call seeking comment. Official certification of the apparent approval of the merger is expected within days.

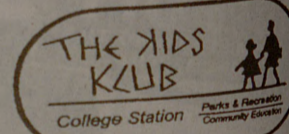

A preliminary tally last week by an independent proxy certifying firm showed 51.4 percent of HP shareholders voted for the Compaq deal, while 48.6 percent came out against it.

With more than 1.6 billion shares voted, Hewlett by 45 million shares.

Hewlett hopes Chancellor William C. III negates the vote either by voiding investors' shares or by determining that the deal was bought votes and corrupted the process.
